The redistributive society has victimized many millions of people through confiscatory taxation, inflation, and regulation. Government acting as the political agency for coercive transfer, seized income and wealth from the more productive members and then redistributed the spoils to its beneficiaries. Although many millions of victims and beneficiaries were involved, which often obscures the morality of the issue, the forced transfer took place between certain individuals. It is true, the beneficiaries, who used political force to obtain the benefits, cannot easily be recognized in the mass process of transfer. But even if we could identify them, and establish a personal right to restoration, our property has been consumed long ago. A vast army of beneficiaries, together with their legions of government officials and civil servants, consumed or otherwise squandered our substance. There is nothing to retrieve from the beneficiaries who probably are poorer than ever before having grown weak and dependent on the transfer process.

When seen in this light, the get even argument is nothing more than a declaration of intention to join the redistribution forces. It may be born from the primitive urge for revenge against government, state or society. But it is individuals who form a government, make a state and constitute a society. By taking revenge against some of them for the injuries suffered from the hands of others, I am merely reinforcing the evil.

Revenge is a common passion that enslaves man's mind and clouds his vision. To the savage it is a noble aspiration that makes him even with his enemies. In a civilized society that is seeking peace and harmony it is a destructive force which law seeks to suppress. But when the law itself becomes an instrument of transfer, the primitive urge for revenge may burst forth as a demand for more redistribution. It becomes a primary force that gives rise to new demands or, at least, reinforces the popular demands for economic transfer. The common passion for revenge, no matter how well concealed, undoubtedly is an important motive power of social policy that leads a free society to its own destruction.

No wealth in the world and no political distribution of this wealth can purchase the peace and harmony so essential to human existence. Peace and harmony can be found only in moral elevation that reaches into every aspect of human life. A free society is the offspring of morality that guides the actions and policies of its members. To effect a rebirth of such a society is to revive the moral principles that gave it birth in the beginning. It is individual rebirth and rededication to the inexorable principles of morality that are the power and the might. The example of great individuals is useful to lead us on the way, for nothing is more contagious for greatness than the power of a great example.

To spearhead a rebirth of our free society let us rededicate ourselves to a new covenant of redemption, which is a simple restatement of public morality. In the setting of our age of economic redistribution and social conflict it may be stated as follows:

No matter how the transfer state may victimize me, I shall seek no transfer payments, or accept any.

I shall seek no government grants, loans or other redistributive favors, or accept any.

I shall seek no government orders on behalf of redistribution, or accept any.

I shall seek no employment, or accept any, in the government apparatus of redistribution.

I shall seek no favors, or accept any, from the regulatory agencies of government.

I shall seek no protection from tariff barriers or any other institutional restrictions of trade and commerce.

I shall seek no services from, or lend support to collective institutions that are creatures of redistribution.

I shall seek no support from, or give support to associations that advocate or practice coercion and restraint.

We do not know whether our great republic will survive this century. If it can be saved, great men of conviction must lead the way—men who with religious fervor and unbounded courage resist all transfer temptations. The heroes of liberty are no less remarkable for what they suffer than for what they achieve.●

FLUORIDE RINSE INTRODUCTORY STATEMENT

HON. TIM LEE CARTER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, it is well known that the most prevalent chronic health problem among our children is tooth decay. Indeed, decay is nearly universal among children. At age 2, half of the children in this country have decayed teeth. Surveys show an average of one cavity a year in children aged 6 to 11 and one and one-half cavities in children aged 12 to 15. Decay is insidious. It begins soon after the primary teeth appear in early childhood and can continue throughout adult life. Almost nobody escapes dental caries, the leading cause of tooth loss before age 35.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, there are known ways to reduce tooth decay. Obviously good oral hygiene practices are extremely important. The most effective cavity preventive mechanism known today is the flouridation of drinking water. However approximately one-half of the citizens of this country, for a variety of reasons, are not drinking flouridated water.

One of the more exciting possibilities in decay prevention has just been announced by the National Institute of Dental Research. Spokesmen for the Institute say that demonstration projects during the last 2 years in 17 parts of the country show that a fluoride mouth rinse for schoolchildren is reducing tooth decay in those areas by an average of 35 percent. Fluoride rinse is a proven preventive measure. It is safe and it is available at a low cost.

For approximately 50 cents a child a year elementary schoolchildren have been rinsing with the fluoride solution once a week in participating school systems with the blessing of the local dental societies and the voluntary concurrence of their parents. The improvement in the dental health of these children has been dramatic according to Dr. James Carlos, head of the Institute's national caries program. Dr. Carlos has said, "We now have a method for partial prevention of caries that is effective, costs very little, is easily administered, and is readily accepted by the public."

Mr. Speaker, I would ask what better endorsement a preventive care public health effort could have, but there are other benefits as well. Most of the participating communities experienced important ripple effects. People became more aware of the importance of dental health. More people were going to dentists and the general level of dental health was increased according to the sponsors of these projects.

This worthy pilot project—preventive, low-cost, and locally endorsed—was supported with $2.5 million in Federal research funds during more than 3 years of operation But the Federal support ends next February when these contracts expire. The communities are then on their own for support and Dr. Carlos assures us that support is likely from local sources. However, he also tells us that we have the potential to make tooth decay a lesser problem for as many as 20 million children in communities lacking fluoridated water by continuing this fluoride rinse effort.

In addition to the obvious benefits of healthier teeth, regular school-based fluoride mouth rinsing can save parents several billions of dollars a year in dental bills. The benefits are uniform across income, social, racial, and community lines. Big city schoolchildren and rural children likewise can enjoy better teeth as a result of this excellent procedure.

I should emphasize that the fluoride rinse project is compatible with water fluoridation, it can add to the benefits of water fluoridation while providing significant new benefits in unfluoridated areas. The rinse is not swallowed by children who participate in the program. This is a safe and effective procedure.

I am, therefore, proposing an amendment to the disease control provisions of the Public Health Service Act to extend the benefits of this worthy effort to make it possible for additional schoolchildren to receive the benefits of the fluoride rinse program. This is a low-cost, effective program, and I urge its approval.

Without objection, I include the recent articles which have appeared in the Washington Post and New York Times concerning the fluoride rinse projects in the RECORD at this point:

FLUORIDE RINSE HELPS SAVE TEETH

(By Victor Cohn)

A weekly one-minute mouthwash with mildly fluoridated water to prevent tooth decay was recommended yesterday to the half the nation that does not fluoridate its drinking water.

The National Institute for Dental Research—a unit of the National Institutes of Health—urged schools and health departments to start regular programs as the result of several new demonstrations showing that the rinsing can reduce children's tooth decay by 35 percent, on the average.

Meanwhile, dentists or doctors can prescribe pills to make the required mouthwash to parents who want to have their children use it once a week—or for any adults who want to try it.

Tooth decay is the leading chronic disease of childhood, and in all, costs the nation $5 billion a year, Dr. James P. Carlos, associate director of the government research institute, estimated. Ideally, all decay is preventable, so wider use of fluoride could save the country billions, he said.

The dental institute recommended the rinsings primarily for children partly because they are in school and can be easily reached, and partly because decay usually tapers off after young adulthood.

"But many adults can probably benefit too, just as they benefit by using fluoridated toothpaste," Carlos said. "They just won't benefit as much, and we can't put a specific number on adult benefit."

Most cities, including Washington, fluoridate their drinking water. But in the Washington area, large parts of Fairfax and Prince William counties do not. And, nationally, Los Angeles, San Diego, San Antonio, Portland, Ore., Phoenix, Birmingham, Newark, and Honolulu are among cities that don't.

Some areas, mainly suburban or rural, don't fluoridate because they lack suitable central water treatment plants at which to add the antidecay chemical. But in many communities there has been successful opposition so far by people who think fluoridatio may cause cancer or other illness or destroy their liberty to drink unmedicated water.

"There is absolutely nothing to the claims that fluoridation causes any illness—those claims have been thoroughly refuted by the National Cancer Institute," Carlos said.

Where water is fluoridated, decay is reduced by 50 to 65 percent by the early teens for youths who have drunk the water since birth, according to Carlos, and by less for those who drank it part of the time.

Periodic application of fluoride solution or gel by dentists typically cuts childhood decay by 35 percent, but is costly, he said. But only half the population goes to a dentist each year.

Use of fluoride toothpaste cuts childhood decay by 15 to 20 percent, Carlos estimated. "And we think over 80 percent of the population now uses it," he added.

But the weekly rinsing can effectively be added to daily fluoride brushing, he said. Children in 17 federal projects demonstrating the rinsing included both fluoride toothpaste users and nonusers.

For two years, 75,000 children through sixth grade in Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Guam, Massachusetts, Michigan, Missouri, Montana, New York, Ohio, Texas and Wisconsin—and Charles City County, Va.—have rinsed for a minute a week with a 0.2 percent sodium fluoride solution.

Various groups have so far shown reductions in decay from 46 percent to nothing, for the 25 percent average benefit.

"If everyone got enough fluoride and got rid of sugary snacks and drinks and chewing gum between meals, decay in this country would approach zero," Carlos said. "I say 'between meals' because you can tolerate sugar occasionally during the day without damage. It's the repeated use that does the harm."

He also advises thorough enough brushing to remove plaque or tartar deposits on teeth, but you should be taught how to do it by your dentist."

SCHOOLS URGED TO USE FLUORIDE MOUTHWASH TO CUT TOOTH DECAY

WASHINGTON, July 18.—A school program that would require students to use fluoride mouthwash once a week could cut tooth decay by about one-third, according to Government scientists.

The National Institute of Dental Research said yesterday that three years of testing with more than 70,000 children showed that weekly use of a fluoride mouthwash could be a good substitute for a communitywide fluoridated water system.

Dr. James P. Carlos, associate director of the institute, said that half the population lived in communities without fluoridated water. "We estimate there are at least 20 million children in nonfluoride communities who could be helped," he added.

He said that dental decay affected more than 90 percent of children, even though the nation spent more than $10 billion in 1977 on dental services.

The three-year project, which focused on elementary schoolchildren in 17 communities that do not have fluoridated water, found that it costs only 50 cents a student to supply mouthwash, cups and paper towels for the 32-week school year.

The average reduction in tooth decay was 35 percent, the scientists said. But the results from the $2.5 million demonstration program varied widely from community to community, based on a random sampling of the children involved.

In seven of the communities, reduction of decay was from 22 percent to 27 percent. In one community, the reduction was 34 percent and in another reached a high of 46 percent.

One test area showed no added reduction of decay after two years, and several others showed only 1 percent to 8 percent. The extremely low figures were attributed to sampling errors and active local dental programs.●

QUANTIFYING INDECENCY

HON. HELEN S. MEYNER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to my colleagues attention the following column by Howard Rosenberg, a staff writer with the Los Angeles Times. It seems inevitable that the Congress and the courts will continue to police the type of language that the public may be exposed to. We are deluding ourselves and our constituents if we maintain that it is the language only—and not the thoughts that they express—that we are regulating. In light of this, I believe that all of us must carefully examine our priorities and our personal standards of violence and obscenity.

I have never heard the now famous George Carlin routine on the "Seven Dirty Words." Moreover, I have no desire to hear this routine, or even those words. I certainly do not condone the use of that type of obscenity. I did, however, hear and see the atrocities espoused by the Nazis in Chicago on July 9. Again, I do not condone that type of obscenity. That was a violent and indecent display, in my mind.

My difficulty is squaring a condonation of the indecency of the Nazis with a condemnation of the indecency of Mr. Carlin. Which is the lesser obscenity? And, are we prepared to quantify indecency? I ask my colleagues to read Mr. Rosenberg's thoughts on this difficult question, and to examine their own.

NAZI: ACCEPTED 4-LETTER WORD

WASHINGTON.—It is bitterly ironic that Frank Collin, who wears a swastika and preaches hate, can shout his message on the nation's airwaves while comedian George Carlin's words against hypocrisy are all but stifled.

On July 9, Collin, the snarling neo-Nazi anti-Semite and white supremacist, denounced Jews and blacks at a rally in Chicago's Marquette Park that was recorded by the media army, including the nation's three commercial television networks.

If failure of the sound system made it almost impossible for Collin to be heard there by his handful of followers and others drawn to the park that day, at least he had the satisfaction of knowing some of his words were broadcast later that day by CBS News.

And coverage by NBC, ABC and the nation's print media ensured that the face of the 33-year-old Collin, until recently an anonymous nobody, would be known in most of America's households.

Six days earlier, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the authority of the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) to act against broadcast media airing a Carlin comedy monologue that recited, in hilarious and devastating detail, the "seven dirty words" banned for broadcast.

The court emphasized that it was acting primarily on behalf of the nation's children. No telling what harm could be done if these words (which one can assume most children have heard and maybe even used) reached the ears of youngsters. After all, as Carlin points out, these words "curve your spine, grow hair on your hands."

The Justices thus affirmed the FCC's definition of the Carlin monologue as indecent. But how can Carlin's monologue be considered indecent compared with the violence-charged preachings of a Frank Collin? At a June 24 rally in Chicago, also given the big media treatment, Collin said about Jews: "In a Nazi America, we would put every one of these creatures in the gas ovens where they belong."

Any station may broadcast that type of obscenity without fear of government sanctions, while Carlin's words are virtually taboo.

Carlin's language is barbed but harmless. There is nothing in his 12-minute monologue that preaches or condones violence or hatred. He is foremost a comedian but also a social satirist whose routine is comprised of short sketches poking fun at contemporary mores. He uses "dirty words" to make us laugh at our own silliness about language. He dissects the words, turns them inside out, wrings them dry until nothing is left. That's the point. There are no dirty words. The words are merely symbols.

"America has always taken pride in its ability to laugh at itself, but it just isn't true," contends Norman Lear, "Bob Hope or Johnny Carson making a joke about President Ford falling down isn't America laughing at itself. America laughing at itself is being able to listen to Lenny Bruce and understand its own foolishness. George Carlin tries to make us do that."

But the most esteemed legal minds sometimes work in wondrous ways. Children tuned to radio or television can hear Collin, the brown-shirted promoter of genocide, but not Carlin, the gentle social satirist.

And the Nazi philosophy has been there for the hearing. Last year, public television's "Black Perspective on the News" aired an outrageous segment in which Collin and David Duke, leader of a splinter Ku Klux Klan group, were allowed to rant virtually at will about Jews and blacks in what was supposed to be a calm and reasoned discussion of their philosophies—as if there were pros and cons to hate.

However, the show's black host and two guests, purportedly on hand for balance, were so unprepared and inept that the hour became a showcase for racism.

Of course, that was not indecent.

The Supreme Court also emphasized that its ruling applied to only repeated use of specific indecent words, not ideas. After all, the chief apprehension about the court decision is that it ultimately will lead to censorship and squelching of free discussion of ideas in broadcasting, which courts have held to be outside the traditional First Amendment guarantees of free speech given other media.

However, the court is perpetrating a double standard of morality and indecency. You won't find in this space a rationale for denying Nazis or anyone else, no matter how odious, an opportunity to be heard on the air and quoted by the rest of the media. However, cutting through all the legalese, you can't have one without the other. You can't say yes to Collin and no to Carlin.

There is a word for Collin and the ideas he represents. But, unfortunately, you can't hear it on the air—or read it here.●

AMERICAN/ANGOLAN DIPLOMACY IN SOUTHERN AFRICA PROMISING

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago, the administration was perilously close to becoming embroiled in the Angolan civil war. The National Security Council, anxious to stir up trouble for the Cubans in Angola, convinced CIA Director Stansfield Turner to explore with Senator DICK CLARK and others ways of circumventing, or even repealing, existing laws which prohibit our financial and material support of factions in that beleaguered country. This, in my judgment, would have been a recipe for disaster for U.S. policy in Africa.

However, the administration wisely eschewed the counsel of newly resurgent cold warriors, who are willing to work with the Communist Chinese, but had become mortified when faced with the presence of Cubans in countries few knew existed a few years ago.

To President Carter's credit, the United States took a different course, sending an envoy to Luanda to reevaluate our relations and explore ways of ameliorating our differences. Once reason was allowed to prevail over rhetoric, an accord was reached on Namibia, and steps were taken to bring about a rapproachment between Zaire and Angola, including a commitment to improve diplomatic relations, reopen the Benguela railway, exchange refugees, and cease aiding each other's dissident groups.

Much of the responsibility for this policy victory should go to Ambassador Andrew Young and his staff, whose painstaking efforts in cooperation with the Angolan Government are paving the way for peace in the region.

It is instructive to analyze the likely outcome had the NSC prevailed and the United States pursued a policy of confrontation with Angola, a policy that would have focused on the symptoms rather than the causes of conflict. The recent crisis in Zaire stems from displaced Katan-gans, located in Northern Angola, who periodically attempt to reclaim the Shaba Province. President Mobutu's corrupt government and neglect of the people living in Shaba have done little to help secure the area. In Angola, the civil war is rooted again in tribal factions, two of which have been challenging the Neto government. By supporting each other's dissidents, Zaire and Angola were fueling an endless cycle of violence; actions on one side of the border simply resulted in recriminations on the other. By engaging in precipitous reactions, funneling support to whomever the Soviets and Cubans were not supporting would have placed the United States strongly on the side of South Africa, which is known to be helping the UNITA faction, headed by Joseph Savambi. In short, by aiding UNITA and FNLA, the United States would have simply escalated the level of violence in a war of proxies between the United States and the Soviet Union, while increasingly vitiating our position with the rest of Africa.

By pursuing an alternative course of cooperation rather than confrontation with key "front-line" states, however, the United States has shown that the presence of Cubans is extraneous to America's primary interest in bringing a peaceful end to the conflicts which beset southern Africa. Instead of growing confrontation and perhaps covert involvement in Africa, the United States, in a bold diplomatic move, successfully negotiated with the Neto government an accord that: First, secured a resolution of the Namibia question; second, put an end to border disputes that were dangerous to Zaire, and thus Western interests, and third, paved the way for Angola to be less, not more, dependent on the Russians and Cubans.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to insert in the RECORD an article by Professor Bender which questions many of the fatuous assumptions being made about the Cuban presence in southern Africa, as well as a recent piece by David Ottaway about the potential for peace in southern Africa. The Soviet Union has a poor record in Africa. Let us not help the Russians by adopting the shortsighted policies of the cold warriors in this country.

NAMIBIA ACCORD KINDLES HOPE FOR REST OF SOUTHERN AFRICA

(By David B. Ottawa)

DAR ES SALAAM, TANZANIA.—The agreement reached Wednesday in the Angolan capital of Luanda between militant Namibian nationalists and five Western powers represents a major diplomatic victory for the West and a breakthrough in its search for negotiated settlements to the burning racial conflicts of southern Africa.

For the first time, there is now some hope that the deteriorating situation throughout this tense region of the continent, scarred by escalating warfare and dotted by massacres of blacks and whites, can be halted and even reversed.

With an internationally acceptable solution to the Namibia dispute now in sight, one of the first consequences of the accord will be to isolate further Rhodesia's recalcitrant transitional government and perhaps force it now to attend a Western-sponsored general peace conference wih its guerrilla adversaries.

For the Soviet Union, the accord can only be a blow to its hopes for increasing its influence in this region through the backing of guerrilla warfare at the West's expense, for it has brought closely together the five major Western powers and the five so-called front-line African states, including the two Marxist ones in Angola and Mozambique, in a combined diplomatic offensive that has finally borne fruit.

The front-line states, whose chairman is Tanzanian President Julius K. Nyerere, played a crucial role in pressuring the Southwest African People's Organization (SWAPO) into accepting the Western plan despite SWAPO's strong objections to several key provisions. Nyerere was reported yesterday to be delighted upon hearing of the agreement.

The same front-line approach toward the nationalist guerrillas in Rhodesia, plus increased South African pressure on the transitional government there, could well now lead to some progress on the deadlocked British-American peace plan for that war-exhausted country, though the situation there remains far more complex.

There is still a rocky road ahead in Namibia for the Western plan. South Africa regards SWAPO president Sam Nujome as an outright "communist," while the Namibian nationalists are convinced the South Africans are out to do them in at the elections.

The agreement is a major personal triumph for U.S. Ambassador Donald McHenry, who for 15 months has practiced a unique style of quiet diplomacy, persisting in his unthanked efforts despite multiple obstacles, repeated setbacks and dire threats from both South Africa and the Namibian nationalists.

McHenry has served as chairman of the so-called Western "contact group" made up of the United States, Britain, France, Canada and West Germany.

The Western proposals provide for United Nations-supervised elections for a constituent assembly in Namibia at which a new constitution will be drawn up. The assembly would also prepare the country for its independence under a black majority government by the end of this year.

About 5,000 U.N. soldiers and 1,000 administrative personnel are to be brought into the country to supervise the transition period jointly with the South African-appointed administrator general, Justice Martinus Steyn.

South Africa is to withdraw all but 1,500 of its more than 20,000 troops now stationed in Namibia before elections are held and then the remainder one week after a U.N. certification of the results.

The South Africans had insisted upon the right to keep those last 1,500 troops in northern Namibia while SWAPO was demanding that they be removed to the far south. It appears the Namibian nationalists were forced to give in to the South African position on this issue at Luanda.

Another key sticking point was the status of Namibia's only deep water port, Walvis Bay, which South Africa insists is a part of its own republic historically and legally. SWAPO is reported to have accepted a formula under which the five Western powers and the U.N. Security Council will recognize Walvis Bay as an integral part of Namibia despite the South African claim to it.

The issue however will be left to later negotiations between South Africa and an independent Namibian government.

South Africa has been ruling the mineral-rich, but sparsely inhabited former German colony since the end of World War I under an old League of Nations mandate. But in 1966, the United Nations ceased to recognize this mandate and began demanding that South Africa give the territory independence.

After more than a year of periodic negotiations, South Africa agreed to the Western plan in late April, but the Namibian nationalist organization broke off talks with the five Western powers after a South African raid May 5 at one of their refugee and guerrilla camps in southern Angola, in which around 800 persons were killed.

With South Africa now committed to a Western-backed plan involving the deployment of a U.N. peacekeeping force, it is thought possible here that Pretoria may now be willing to step up pressure on Rhodesia's transitional government to negotiate a similar internationally acceptable solution there.

The Tanzanian theory is that South Africa can ill-afford to back an internal settlement in Rhodesia, such as is being tried now, once it has accepted a totally different approach to Namibia. This view is shared by many American and other Western diplomats in the region.

However, South African Prime Minister John Vorster has publicly come out in support of the new biracial transitional government in Rhodesia and even criticized the United States and other Western countries for not doing the same.

The Patriotic Front, representing guerrilla now fighting in Rhodesia, has appeared to have adopted a position lately that there is little need to negotiate since it is apparently winning against the transitional government. But the front-line states, which have supported the British-American peace plan, could, if they wished, force the guerrillas to take the diplomatic route. These states supply most of the guerrillas' African backing, especially Zambia and Mozambique, from which the guerrillas operate.

The agreement in Luanda has come after months of tedious negotiations.

McHenry, as the Western group's chairman, traveled tens of thousands of miles between New York, where he is deputy head of the U.S. Mission to the United Nations and seven African capitals. At times he was on the road a month or six weeks at a stretch crisscrossing the continent. Much of the time was spent tracking down SWAPO president Nujoma, possibly the most slippery nationalist leader the West has to deal with in Southern Africa.

South African provocations and threats to "go it alone" were another major hazard along the way, but McHenry was once again heard to remark in a state of exhaustion in Lusaka, "I've got more patience than they have and I'm going to outlast them all until they agree."

SOUTH AFRICANS ARE PLEASED BUT SUSPICIOUS OF SWAPO

JOHANNESBURG.—South African Government officials and political leaders yesterday welcomed SWAPO's acceptance of a Western proposal for independence in Nambia but expressed suspicion about what assurance the Western powers have given the black nationalist movement to get its agreement to the plan.

Foreign Minister Pik Botha said the latest development "could herald a new era in southern Africa," but added that the "South African government accepted that no qualifications of any nature—direct or by implication—would be added to the proposals."

South Africa is especially concerned about what the Western countries have told SWAPO will be their position on the disputed territory of Walvis Bay.

Commenting on the SWAPO acceptance, political leaders in Namibia also were anxious to know about the "still unknown details of the deal struck between the Western powers and SWAPO," the South African Press Agency reported. The Afrikaans-language newspaper, Die Suidwester, which supports the South African-backed party in the territory, commented that "it would be dangerous to assume that SWAPO would play the game to the end."

The Western proposals provide for United Nations-supervised elections for a constituent assembly in Namibia at which a new constitution will be drawn up. The assembly would also prepare the country for its independence under a black majority government by the end of this year.

About 5,000 U.N. soldiers and 1,000 administrative personnel are to be brought into the country to supervise the transition period jointly with the South African-appointed administrator general, Justice Martinus Steyn.

South Africa is to withdraw all but 1,500 of its more than 20,000 troops now stationed in Namibia before elections are held and then the remainder one week after a U.N. certification of the results.

The South Africans had insisted upon the right to keep those last 1,500 troops in northern Namibia while SWAPO was demanding that they be removed to the far south. It appears the Namibian nationalists were forced to give in to the South African position on this issue at Luanda.

Another key sticking point was the status of Namibia's only deep water port, Walvis Bay, which South Africa insists is a part of its own republic historically and legally. SWAPO is reported to have accepted a formula under which the five Western powers and the U.N. Security Council will recognize Walvis Bay as an integral part of Namibia despite the South African claim to it.

SWAPO then began hardening its demands to include a revamping of the police force in Namibia as well as insisting on South African acceptance of Walvis Bay as part of Namibia before its independence and the removal of all South African troops to the southern part of Namibia.

But a summit of the front-line states in early June in Luanda broke the impasse and led to their decision to force SWAPO into stopping its demands.

U.S. POLICY ON CUBANS IN AFRICA

(By Gerald J. Bender)

The presence of Cubans in Africa has stymied both the Ford and the Carter Administrations. Under Gerald R. Ford, Henry A. Kissinger's globalist approach actually contributed to an increase in the number of Cuban troops in Southern Africa; Zbigniew Brzezinski's similar influence on President Carter's policy would have the same effect. Obviously it is time for the United States to rethink its entire approach to the issue of Cubans in Africa.

This reappraisal should begin by differentiating the Cuban presence in one African country from another, just as the United States commonly does when considering the presence of the Russians, Chinese, French or British in various African countries.

For example, the United States generally does not view the Soviet presence in Ethiopia in the same way that it views any Soviet involvement in Nigeria. It follows that a distinction should be made between Cuban activities in Ethiopia, on the one hand, and in Sierra Leone, Tanzania or even Angola on the other. The issue should not be the mere presence of Cubans in Africa, but, rather, where and when do the Cubans represent a threat to American or African interests or security?

The key to making this distinction is the clarification and articulation of precisely what Americans find objectionable about the Cuban involvement. Does the United States object to the presence of all Cubans, including doctors and engineers, or only soldiers, does it object to all Cuban soldiers, including noncombatant instructors (U.S. intelligence classifies as "troops" Cubans from the regular army or reserves who perform civilian functions in Angola), or only those who fight?

Should the United States protest when Cuban soldiers fight in any part of Africa (such as against South Africans in Angola), or only when they help crush self-determination movements, as in Eritrea? Finally, do the more than 1,000 Cuban teachers scattered throughout nearly every province represent a genuine threat to American goals and interests? Does the United States oppose the presence of several thousand Cuban soldiers in Cabinda who help to protect the vulnerable Gulf Oil installations? Is it agitated about Cubans who help provide security for the teams of Boeing technicians installing radar in seven Angolan airports? Are U.S. interests threatened when Cuba assists the M.P.L.A. regime in thwarting a bloody coup attempt by extreme leftists and black racists?

Thus far, Mr. Carter and Mr. Brzezinski have raised blanket objections to the Cubans in Angola, with no public recognition of their multifaceted and often constructive role in that country.

The Administration must spell out precisely what it finds objectionable about the Cuban-Angolan relationship. A coherent, practical policy on this issue is especially important today, since it also affects the normalization of U.S. relations with the Angolan and Cuban Governments, it ties with many other African nations, and, most important, U.S. relations with the Soviet Union.

To most African nations, the American attitude toward the Cubans in Angola smacks of hypocrisy and of an arrogance that Mr. Carter pledged to eliminate from foreign policy. This is generally the attitude of the Nigerian leaders whom he recently visited (and with whom, ironically, both the United States and Angola closely coordinate their African policies).

How does the United States' claim that its presence in these (and other) countries is legitimate because we were invited by sovereign governments differ from the Cuban's claim that they were invited by the People's Republic of Angola? There are more Americans, military and civilian advisers, working in Iran and Saudi Arabia than there are Cubans, Russians and other Eastern Europeans in Angola.

Moreover, what difference does the Carter Administration see between the rationale and nature of the French and Cuban presence in Africa?

Today there are over 2,000 French nationals living in French-speaking Africa, many of whom work as advisers and technicians for their host governments. In addition, France has over 10,000 troops stationed throughout the continent, engaged in wars in Chad and Mauritania as well as Zaire. There are more than 1,600 French officers serving directly in African armies.

Therefore, if the National Security Council estimated the number of French in Africa using the same categories that it applies to Cubans, the French presence would turn out to be considerably larger than Cuba's.

One obvious difference noted by many Africans is that Cuba apparently seeks no direct economic stake in Africa's future. By contrast, French interests control over 50 percent of the modern economic sector of the Ivory Coast, Senegal, Gabon and Camèroon. Thus, criticizing the Cubans while condoning and even assisting the French may not only strain American cerdibility in Africa but leave our fledgling African policy vulnerable to the charge that the Carter Administration is primarily interested in assisting French neocolonialism.

Mr. Carter claimed that his trip to Africa last spring was intended in part to assist in the transition to majority rule in the southern part of the continent. Yet his Administration has refused to recognize the Angolan Government, one of the key front-line states designated by the Organization for African Unity to assist in that transition in Namibia and Rhodesia (and whose cooperative attitude has been cited privately by one of the American negotiators as having greatly facilitated the Namibian discussions).

The United States faces an enormous task in breaking down African suspicions and distrust, given the legacy of past American policy in Southern Africa. The U.S. refusal to recognize the Agostinho Neto's regime only serves to nourish these suspicions further and thus undermines Washington's efforts to play the role of an honest broker.

Mr. Carter has argued that "the establishment of relations does not involve approval or disapproval (of a government), but merely demonstrates a willingness on our part to conduct our affairs with other governments directly."

Every close American ally has recognized the Luanda Government, confident that there is something to gain from conducting face-to-face relations. Every major American corporation currently operating in Angola—including Gulf, Mobil, Texaco, Boeing, Cities Service and others—favors immediate recognition.

Some corporate representatives complain that it is difficult to find American technicians who are willing to work in a country where they have no diplomatic protection. Moreover, most of these businessmen do not support the Administration's position on the withdrawal of the Cubans. In fact, they privately hope that the Cubans remain, to provide security and to continue their vital role in keeping the country's modern sector functioning (from fixing elevators in the cities to repairing bridges in the hinterland).

The State Department sponsored a symposium on Angola last February that was attended by academics, representatives from major American corporations, journalists, Congressional staff members and a cross-section of officials from the department itself. At the end of a day and a half of discussions, all agreed to the proposition that it is in the best interests of the United States to establish diplomatic relations with the People's Republic of Angola as soon as possible. Noticeably absent from the symposium was a representative from the National Security Council, which holds a contrary view that it has apparently been able to impose on the President.

If Carter continues to view Angola through Mr. Brzezinski's narrow globalist perspective, then the President may be the one to undermine his own 1976 campaign hope that the United States would "be a positive and creative force for good in Angola." If the United States misses that opportunity in Angola, its prospects may also suffer in the rest of Southern Africa.●

TERRORISM IN SPAIN

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, the recent period of escalating violence marked by 5 days of rioting in the Basque region of northern Spain and the assassination of two Spanish military officers last Friday—July 21—has brought to attention the activities of Spanish terrorist organizations attempting to undermine that important Western nation.

The most active of the Spanish terrorist organizations operates principally in the Basque provinces and is called ETA, an abbreviation for the Basque phrase "Euzkadi ta Azkatasuna" which means "Basque Nation and Freedom." In general the U.S. press reports have confused the ETA terrorist organization with the Basque Nationalist Party from which it split in 1959 and have characterized ETA as a "nationalist" or "separatist" rather than as "terrorist."

ETA is a Marxist revolutionary organization which seeks the formation of a separate Basque Marxist state from territory in northern Spain and southern France. ETA has a number of factions that compete with each other in demonstrating their militancy and the "correctness" of their particular lines by assassinating moderate Basque leaders who have publicly expressed their opposition to the ETA's terrorism, as well as by carrying out sabotage and terrorism against Spanish business and government targets. ETA's recent record of violence includes an attack on a nuclear powerplant under construction, blowing up sections of railroad track, and shooting Basque leaders supporting the recent transfer of major powers of autonomy to the elected Basque General Council.

One faction of the ETA, the ETA(VI), is a Trotskyite Communist group officially affiliated with the Fourth International and its Spanish section, the Liga Comunista Revolucionaria (LCR). The LCR's Basque division, LKI, forms the overt political cover for the ETA(VI) terrorist group.

The Spanish Trotskyists took a leading role in provoking the street fighting in which two rioters were killed and several hundred were injured. The initial rioting stemmed from a disruption of a bullfight in Pamplona on July 8 by LKI/LCR members who climbed down into the bull ring with a banner demanding independence for the Basque provinces. Fist fights broke out as those opposing the Balkanization of Spain rushed into the melee. Thirty Spanish riot police rushed in firing rubber bullets and throwing smoke bombs in an attempt to clear the arena.

At that point, due to a number of factors including polarized political passions and the general aura of excitement around the weeklong Pamplona "running of the bulls" festival that attracts thousands of tourists, many of the spectators joined in the melee which quickly spread to the surrounding streets. Mobs moved through the streets setting cars afire, breaking the windows of shops and restaurants, and looting. Some police, failing to stop the rioting in the bull ring with rubber bullets, were seen to use their pistols. One person, LCR member German Rodriguez, 27, was shot to death. The LCR/LKI used his funeral on July 10, to instigate additional rioting. Some 3,000 LCR/LKI supporters marched from the cemetery back to the center of Pamplona, sang the song used by the Fourth International as its theme, "the Internationale." Baiting of the riot police was followed by street fighting. Agitators in other Basque cities used the Pamplona disturbances to provoke rioting.

During the disturbances, it should be noted that Basque extremists and Basque moderates held separate demonstrations, and that in at least one case in San Sebastian, fought with each other in a street riot.

All in all, the extremists, spearheaded by the LCR/LKI action in Pamplona, has served to further polarize Spanish society. The ETA is continuing with its campaign of extortion of businessmen, bombings and terrorism of Basque moderates. The Basque Nationalist Party appears to have moved toward rejecting the regional autonomy granted in Spain's new draft constitution in favor of its old "non-negotiable demand" of total independence which still further encourages the ETA terrorists; and assorted anti-Marxist vigilante groups are pursuing courses of street thuggery and intimidation which are actually helping the Marxists accomplish the destruction of the government in Spain. Unprofessional police conduct during the disorders has brought stern criticism and reprimands to members of the national police. At the present time they are not the high morale, professional, well-trained modern force needed to cope effectively with street disturbances.

The revolutionary terrorists recognize the opportunity presented to increase disorder in Spain and are trying to take advantage of it. In Madrid on July 21, three terrorists assassinated two Spanish Army officers in an action of the sort carried out previously by the West German Red Army Faction—Baader-Meinhof Gang—and the Italian Red Brigade. Brig. Gen. Juan Sanchez Ramos, 64, and his aide, Lt. Col. Juan Perez Rodriguez, 59, were shot to death by a man and a woman, apparently armed with automatic pistols or small machineguns, as they waited to be driven to the Defense Ministry. The general was not known to be involved in politics and was in charge of the armaments supplies section of the artillery.

The two terrorists escaped in a stolen taxi, apparently driven by an accomplice. A police sergeant who arrived at the assassination site as the two were escaping fired and may have wounded one of the killers.

Shortly after the assassinations, a spokesman for the Proletarian Armed Groups, a previously unknown organization, called a Spanish news magazine to take responsibility for "executing" what he termed "two fascist soldiers." Later a woman called a Spanish newspaper to claim responsibility for the killings on behalf of GRAPO, the Revolutionary Anti-Fascist Group of the First of October, a Maoist terrorist group named after the date of their first murder of police officers in 1975. GRAPO has been linked with the pro-Peking Communist party in Spain.

This country has important defense interests in Spain, which is strategically situated on both the Atlantic and Mediterranean. Since the change of government in Spain, the various Marxist-Leninist factions have been trying for major positions of influence. The strongest of these is the Spanish Communist Party which is going through an elaborate maneuver of "eurocommunization" in order to appear less subservient to Moscow, and less totalitarian that it is. The Soviet Union also has a strong interest in Spain and recently tried to gain the right to build a naval base along the Mediterranean. In Italy, where there is also a strong Communist party seeking to enter the government, there is also a strong terrorist movement working to disrupt the social order and undermine the existing government.

One of the Italian terrorist groups, the Red Brigades, has had training in Czechoslovakia and has had the use of sophisticated Czech and Soviet machineguns in some of its terrorist actions.

The ETA also has recently been linked to the Soviet bloc's network of terrorist training camps. An Associated Press report on July 6, 1978, stated that Spanish police sources had revealed that several members of the ETA had confessed they received 3 months of terrorist training in an Algerian Army camp outside Algiers. The report stated that the ETA terrorists had been trained by instructors who spoke Spanish with a Cuban accent and that other camp instructors had confirmed that those instructors were Cubans. Cuba has as many as 500 civilian and military advisers in Algeria, some of which are assigned to the terrorist training camps for Middle Eastern, African, and European terrorists.

Reports from the Western intelligence agencies state that the ETA has longstanding contacts with both wings of the Irish Republican Army (IRA), with the Palestine Liberation Organization (PLO), with African and Latin American terrorist groups, and with the allegedly "separatist" groups in Brittany and Corsica. Obviously the Communist strategists are capable of taking advantage of the small groups of "separatists" and giving them the training, contacts and explosives needed to sow choas.

The rise in terrorism in Spain at this critical time is yet one more example of the Communists' plans for the capture of the Western world.

FEDERAL REGULATIONS INTERFERES WITH NURSING HOME CARE

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 25, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, if President Carter truly wants to reduce the cost of health care in the United States, he would do well to put the brakes on the unrestrained growth of Federal regulation.

As a nursing home administrator from my district pointed out in a recent letter to me, the rampant Federal and State regulation that exists today is interfering with the quality of care the nursing home is able to provide.

During a 25 working day time period, the nursing home had representatives from some government regulatory agency in the facility for 12 of those days. The representatives from the five regulatory agencies spent a total of about 24 working days at public expense in the nursing home. They took up between 75 and 80 hours of nursing home staff time that should have been used to care for the residents.

The nursing home in my district is just one of the countless examples throughout the country of the negative effects Federal regulations can have as they continue to grow out of control. While regulations and inspections can serve a useful purpose, their usefulness is drastically diminished by the duplicated efforts of Government regulators paid out of hard-earned tax dollars.

I offer for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a letter from Charles E. Carlson, administrator of St. Luke's Lutheran Home in Blue Earth, Minn. His letter serves as another notice to those of us in Congress of the need for regulatory reform.

The letter follows:

ST. LUKE'S LUTHERAN HOME,
Blue Earth, Minn., June 15, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS HAGEDORN,
U.S. Representative,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. HAGEDORN: Nursing homes have been the target of regulatory agencies for several years now, and nursing home administrators would be the first to say that some good has come from regulations and inspections. The time has come, however, when regulation and inspection have reached the point of harassment and are doing little to upgrade the quality of care given in nursing homes; but they are increasing costs of providing quality care for our senior citizens. Let me tell you what has led me to plead for your assistance in calling a halt to these unnecessary expenditures of both public and private funds.

On May 11, 1978, two surveyors arrived to begin the annual inspection by the Minnesota Department of Health. In case you are not familiar with the system, their duty is to check for compliance with the rules and regulations of MHD relating to licensure. At the same time, they are looking for compliance with Federal regulations covering certification for skilled and intermediate care under title XIX. These two ladies spent the entire day in the facility again on May 12. May 15 they returned with a third member on their team and spent the entire day. On May 16 the three-person team conducted their exit interview, at which time they discussed with department supervisors some of their recommendations. Their final report was very fair and reasonable, also very helpful. Also on May 15, we were visited by an inspector from the Veterans Administration with whom we have a contract for nursing care for certain eligible veterans. May 17 a two-person team employed by the Quality Assurance and Review Program of the Minnesota Department of Health arrived. Their arrival, unlike the earlier team, had been announced in advance and we had been asked to fill out a three-page form on each of 67 residents under the Medicaid program. When this team arrived the morning of May 17, they set up their exit interview for 11:15 a.m. on May 23, making the arrangements with the Medical Director without consulting the administrator or anyone else. This team spent May 17, 18, 19, 22 and 23 in the facility and during that time they reviewed charts and visited with residents and staff. On the last day of their visit they were accompanied by a doctor for the exit interview. At the time they discussed their recommendations regarding a number of residents and procedures. They emphasize at all times that they are not regulatory, but can only make recommendations. Today those recommendations arrived in writing and we are expected to respond to them within 30 days.

June 1 we received a call from a representative of the United States Department of Labor inquiring about a certificate authorizing special minimum wage rate for a handicapped worker. He announced that he would be arriving that afternoon to look at the file on that worker. When he arrived, he looked at that file and from that launched into a complete review of the entire payroll, challenging our right to have department supervisors on monthly salary and exempt from overtime pay. He has interviewed employees and requested information from payroll records for the past two years and our staff has spent many hours in compiling this information. He is expected back again this week and we are waiting to see what orders will be received from the Department of Labor.

Today we expect a visit from a Utilization Review Control Unit of the Department of Public Welfare. They, like the Quality Assurance Team, will be looking at records of residents under Title XIX. Our paper work will again be scrutinized.

I think you can well appreciate that all of these inspectors are taking a great deal of our staff time which should be spent in providing care to our residents. While they are in the facility telling us that they are here to help us improve the quality of care we are providing, they are in fact interfering with that care. Out of the last 25 working days, we have had representatives from some regulatory agency in the facility 12 days. With from 1 to 3 people here on various days this amounts to about 24 working days paid for with public funds. We estimate that it has taken 75 to 80 hours of our staff time away from their regular duties. This time is paid for by our residents.

Please don't misunderstand me. I am not opposed to inspection to meet reasonable standards, but this past month has made us aware of the duplication of effort that exists. Health Department Surveyors, who have regulatory power, have told us they feel their inspection assures quality of care; yet that same department sends a second team which is not regulatory, but can only make recommendations, and they spend even more time and deal only with the residents being paid for under the Medicaid program. They talk about being guardians of the public funds that pay for these residents care, but we see huge expenditures of public funds to pay their salaries to do a job that has already been done. Utilization Review has been looked at by the Health Department Surveyors, the Quality Assurance Team and now a representative of the Department of Public Welfare and when it comes to a final decision on level of care, it is the residents's doctor who has the last word in spite of all the inspectors.

As the administrator of a non-profit home dedicated to meeting the physical, social and spiritual needs of 175 residents, I am asking you to use your influence to eliminate some of this duplication and thereby allow us to devote our time and efforts to provide the best possible care for these residents at the lowest possible cost to the taxpayers as well a those who pay their own bill.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES E. CARLSON,
Administrator.●

SENATE—Wednesday, July 26, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 9:30 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. PATRICK J. LEAHY, a Senator from the State of Vermont.

Mr. LEAHY. Senator HODGES will offer the prayer.

PRAYER

The Reverend KANEASTER HODGES, JR., a Senator from the State of Arkansas, offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, we turn to You at the opening of this legislative day. Be present in this hallowed and historic Chamber, as You accept us, despite our limitations, so we may accept one another; as You forgive us, despite our mistakes, so may we forgive one another; as You offer us new hope and new opportunity each day, so may we offer renewal one to another.

These who serve in this Senate are leaders of this Nation and of all the world. May we rise to new heights. Let us match the eloquence of our words with the integrity of our actions. Stimulate our minds to draw wisdom from the past; to draw sustenance and strength from the present; give us broad vision and new dreams for the future. Make the contributions of today positive, uplifting, of service to mankind. Make us restless and unhappy with anything less than our best efforts, individually or collectively.

We pray that what is done in this Senate this day be pleasing in Thy sight. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable PATRICK J. LEAHY, a Senator from the State of Vermont, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,

Mr. LEAHY thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no requirement for my time and I yield it back.

ANNOUNCEMENT PERTAINING TO EULOGIES TO THE LATE HONORABLE JAMES B. ALLEN, OF ALABAMA, HONORABLE CLIFFORD R. ALLEN, OF TENNESSEE, AND THE HONORABLE WILLIAM M. KETCHUM, OF CALIFORNIA

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, this announcement is to advise the membership that the closing date for printing the eulogies and encomiums to the late Senator James B. Allen, of Alabama, Representative Clifford R. Allen, of Tennessee, and Representative William M. Ketchum, of California, has been set for Friday, August 4, 1978. All copy for insertion must be submitted before this cutoff date so as to be included in the compendium of eulogies.●

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

(During the consideration of S. 3075 the following requests were made:)

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Consumer Subcommittee of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to hold an oversight hearing on the Motor Vehicle Information and Cost Savings Act.

I make this request on behalf of the majority and minority leaders.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Select Committee on Indian Affairs be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to hold a hearing on S. 3043, legislation amending the Navajo-Hopi Relocation Act.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of S. 3075, which will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 3075) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT NO. 3285

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), amendment No. 3285, on which there is a time limitation of 1 hour.

The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) proposes amendment numbered 3285.

Beginning on page 30, line 14, strike out all through page 31, line 5.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "SEC. 26." and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 25.".

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Terry Emerson, my assistant, be granted the privileges of the floor during the debate today.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. President, the amendment strikes section 25 of the bill, which imposes new and broad export controls on items which have what is called "political-military implications."

I would like to read that section. It is short:

COMMERCIAL SALES

SEC. 25. Section 38 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended at the end thereof by adding the following:

"(f)(1) Any item the export of which would have significant political-military implications for any region of the world and which item is not otherwise designated as a defense article pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall be approved for export by the Department of Commerce only pursuant to validated license procedures rather than pursuant to general licenses.

"(2) Any proposed exports of items described in paragraph (1) of this subsection shall be referred to the Secretary of State for review prior to approval for export by the Department of Commerce.

"(3) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or to Japan, Australia, or New Zealand.".

Thus, section 25 would create a new category of export items for which businessmen must get a validated license, instead of a general license, in order to sell abroad. The committee bill further provides that the covered item shall be referred to the Secretary of State for review prior to approval for export by the Department of Commerce.

The only exceptions which the provision gives are to countries in NATO or to Japan, Australia, or New Zealand. So what this means is that the Department of Commerce or the Secretary of State, or both, or the President, can impose embargoes on any items purchased or intended to be purchased by nearly any country in the world, including friendly countries like Mexico, some of our friends in South America, and so forth and so on.

Iran is another country which has been very friendly to us.

We will give this new power, which I do not believe is needed, which, in effect, Mr. President, is transferring the power to make foreign policy to the Department of Commerce and directly to the Department of State, circumventing the person who is responsible for foreign policy, the President of the United States.

This means that there would be a new bureaucratic structure set up whereby the State Department could exercise control over the export to most foreign countries of U.S. goods and products.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the language of section 25, which uses the term "political-military implications," would allow the Government to prevent the sales of almost any item it wants to virtually any country of the world. There is no definition of what "political-military implications" means. Nor is any guidance given in the committee report on S. 3075 to help explain what criteria shall be used in finding that any item proposed for export will have these implications.

This would give the State Department enormous control over what is sold to countries with which the United States has long and friendly ties. For example, Israel would be covered by the committee language. Iran would be. Taiwan would be. Mexico would be. And so on.

Do we really want to give the President, through the State Department and the Department of Commerce, such a broad power to control exports from this country to the rest of the world? I thought that we had just recently passed laws repealing much of the extraordinary authority which Congress had earlier vested in the President for use in time of national emergency, but which had been lingering on and on, long after the circumstances for which such powers were given had changed.

Have we already forgotten the enactment on December 7 of Public Law 95–223, which restricts the authority of the President to impose international economic controls during peacetime? Have we already forgotten that Congress enacted Public Law 94–412 in 1976, which terminated four existing states of emergency dating back to 1933 that had remained in force, although the relevant crisis had long passed?

Now, it is proposed that we start the process all over again and resume vesting a tremendous new power in the President, which he does not now have, at a time when we are not at war around the globe.

Mr. President, I am not speaking about controls on the sale of what is recognized as a defense article.

I am not speaking of powers which the President possesses to block the sale, for example, of advanced computers to the Soviet Union.

The President already has ample authority to do this. The Export Administration Act of 1969 and the Arms Export Control Act give the President extensive powers right now to restrict exports when it is in the national interest.

The Export Administration Act allows the President to prohibit exports for reasons of, first, short supply in the United States; second, foreign policy; and third, national security.

These three grounds for denying exports are so broad that the Government already has great power in the field. By adding a new power in addition to the present authority, it is my concern and the concern of many exporting industries in this country that virtually unlimited embargo power will be given to the President.

It is ironic, Mr. President, that this amendment would be offered at a time when the United States is suffering a record trade deficit. For the first half of 1978, our trade imbalance is running at a projected annual rate of approximately $40 billion in the red. Now, along comes the Senate with a proposed new restriction on exports. Even if a business is successful in obtaining a validated license as required by section 25, it will have to go through a great deal of administrative expense and a delay of weeks, if not months, to get a favorable decision. I suggest, Mr. President, that this is no way to promote trade.

Let me give a specific example—and mind you, this is only one. I refer my colleagues to the fact that the reason we are operating so much in the red in our trade balance is mostly due to our slipping position in the manufacture and sale of airframes, engines, and avionics, something we have been going through now for quite a few years. However, the General Aviation Manufacturers Association—these are people who make small private-type aircraft or corporate-type aircraft that weigh generally under 12,000 pounds—these people sell a tremendous amount of aircraft around the world. I quote directly from a statement that appeared in Aviation Week & Space Technology just last week—a statement made by Mr. Robert Lair of the Cessna Aircraft Co. He said of Carter's human rights policy regarding export sales:

> We are having increasing difficulty conducting business overseas. It is not possible to determine one day to the next what countries are on what list for export. A human rights group in the State Department, the office of Patricia Derian, Assistant Secretary for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs, passes on each export application with the right to veto. No approved or disapproved list of countries is published, and the whole matter rests with a select group of individuals who are unapproachable. Because we must accept orders many months in advance of requirements for an export license, we have been placed in a position of having completed aircraft orders involving hundreds of thousands of dollars, and then having the license refused or interminably delayed. It is a mess.

I cite that remark by the president of one aircraft company in this country making small aircraft that are sold literally around the world.

Many of these aircraft are sold to South Africa. I have a hunch that South Africa probably buys as many aircraft from U.S. manufacturers as any country. Yet even in South Africa, manufacturers cannot get a clear decision as to just how to interpret human rights. They have a hard time getting a decision as to whether the particular item might come under "political-military implications," because, as I said, there is no definition of this term at all.

What is a political-military implication? I happen to know in one case of one airplane, a Cessna 180, that is said to have political-military implications, because it is an airplane. Now, it is a very small airplane; it is not armed. It could be used for observation purposes, but no political-military implications as I understand the term. And certainly we have had no help from the committee or the administration in telling us what "political-military implications" really means. In the absence of that, Mr. President, I do not think it is proper or necessary for a committee of this Congress or a body of this Congress to load down the already overloaded American businessmen with further restrictions when they are having such a hard time getting along as it is.

I also point out that section 25 is unclear as to whether or not agricultural products are to be controlled as well as manufactured goods. If so, this would only increase the ominous and potentially harmful effect of the provision—again, Mr. President, without any understanding of what "political-military implications" means. An army marches on its stomach and, certainly, food would have to be considered, in my understanding of "political-military implication" as an article that would fall under this definition. I would not be surprised to see the Department of Commerce or the State Department deny food to a certain country, because they were not recognizing human rights in the way that the State Department or the Department of Commerce felt they should.

I merely cite food, because we are hearing more and more of our great responsibility in this country to feed the rest of the world. Yet, if we have the wrong person in the State Department or the wrong person in the Department of Commerce, we, in effect, can say that we deny food to large parts of this Earth on the implication that it could have political-military meaning.

The only explanation that the committee report gives as to the reason for section 25 is a brief description of two cases. First, the report mentions the proposed sale to Libya of trucks which, it was discovered, could carry tanks as well as oil equipment.

I have a hunch that took a lot of intelligence to discover. But this is no reason for expanding the existing law. What happened is that after the potential military character of the trucks was known, the administration announced its intention to deny the sale under the foreign policy authority of the Export Administration Act. In other words, the very example which is given in the committee report shows that there is sufficient authority under present law for controlling the export and that no other authority is needed.

Mr. President, the second example given in the committee report is the sale of helicopters to Uganda in 1971. I contend that the sales were allowed, not because of any lack of control or authority in the law, but because our Government did not recognize at the time just how intolerable the Amin regime would be. He took power, I believe, in early 1971, shortly before the sale was made. I have not heard anyone contend that the laws are not broad enough today to prevent that sale, knowing what we do about Amin.

Finally, Mr. President, I suggest that if the Senate feels that changes should be made in the procedure by which export items can be controlled by the President, we should address this next year. The Export Administration Act expires on September 30, 1979. This guarantees that extensive hearings will be held early in 1979 and Congress could, at that time, weigh carefully the costs and benefits of changes in export control.

By acting hastily now, we could do irreparable damage to our foreign trade at a time when the dollar is declining on world markets and our trade deficit is growing. We also could give almost unlimited power over exports to the State Department and the President in time of peace. Congress should at least have hearings on this before granting it.

Before I conclude, Mr. President, I have this question: Will embargoes really have an influence on a particular country that we do not feel is practicing human rights the way we would like to see them practice them? If we had used embargo under our great economic powers that we had at the end of World War II, I think this instrument of exerting power would have been very, very effective. But we are no longer the only dominant power in this world economically. We have countries standing in line hoping that we shall continue to be stupid enough to put on embargoes, opening up the markets for countries overseas. We no longer have a corner on aircraft manufacturing or engines or avionics or computers.

We no longer have a corner on high technology needed to develop these items where 25 or 30 years ago we did.

Today, if we say to a country that we are not going to ship anything to them that might have military implications, there are countries standing in line to sell this type of thing to the same countries that we are embargoing.

I will have to say that economically I cannot see where this embargo in Rhodesia, for example, has had any bad effect on them economically. I think now they are probably suffering because of the war. But the last time I was over there, I found the embargo did one thing, it forced the Rhodesians to diversify and, instead of being just an agricultural nation, they were becoming a nation interested in many other facets and their economy was on the go.

I visited South Africa this last Easter and I was told, as I have remarked before, by the Prime Minister that—

> You chaps think that we can't live without you. To the contrary, we can, but you can't live without us.

I think that is true.

I would just like to make a statement here and then have this article printed in the RECORD that appeared in Government Executive.

If we force our concepts of government on foreign governments, concepts that might be foreign to them at this time, concepts that we all believe in, if we try to make them change, particularly where we are trying to help the black people, Mr. President, I can say that we will never help the blacks anyplace in Africa by chasing the whites out, because they are a long, long way from being able to conduct the business of South Africa, for example, where the whites have been for many, many years and have created good economies.

Some day, I think the blacks can take over, but, if we suddenly remove all the whites from South Africa, this does not mean we are helping the blacks. But it means we are denying them jobs and denying them education.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that an article that appeared in Government Executive entitled "Why Black Development Will Be Separate or Not at All" be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WHY BLACK DEVELOPMENT WILL BE SEPARATE OR NOT AT ALL

(By C. W. Borklund)

The majority of white South Africans are convinced, says Rand Afrikaans University Professor Gerritt Viljoen (one of their leading spokesman), that "nothing we do politically, except capitulate, apparently will satisfy world opinion or even the leaders of the Western countries. We have no hope of satisfying the world by concessions or corrections."

Even if they thought it was possible, U.S. demands, for one, have been, while noisy and insistent, so ambiguous and imprecise it's doubtful if the South African government would know where to begin. In addition to U.S. "human rights" pontifications violating, in effect, the natural order of independent nation-States, a long-standing governmental habit of listening almost entirely to African black radicals—plus an habitual suspicion of free enterprise, anyway—has resulted in a grotesque misreading of southern Africa's political and economic environment.

Thus, South Africans, trying to make some sense out of U.S., let alone United Nations. pronouncements about South African policies have concluded:

A—The U.S. political leadership believes—"wrongly," say South African whites—that a violent, revolutionary black takeover in Southern Africa is inevitable;

B—The U.S. is anxiously building what it thinks, "again, wrongly," are friendships with the radical leaders most likely to lead that bloody overthrow so that, in the end, the "new leadership" will lean to the West and not to communism.

In addition to that being a dismal philosophy for a democracy to be pursuing—supporting terrorism and rule by a minority—ancillary U.S. actions and threats would, if successful, assure the continued existence of the very things the self-appointed "spokesmen" decry, namely segregation and a low standard of living.

FREEDOM FOR ALL

South African whites, says Viljoen, "accept that one group of people cannot always remain politically subservient to another." But, he adds, equality "cannot be achieved by making the more developed White politically subservient to the less-developed Black. South African Whites are not prepared to buy freedom for Blacks at the cost of their own freedom."

"The only alternative," he sums up, "is the concept of separate freedoms which will give Blacks political freedom without asking Whites to give up their own." Further, says Professor of Economics at Stellenbosch University, S. J. Terreblanche, "Political development can't take place in a vacuum. It has to have economic development to support it" because, if for no other reason, "every new class, when it gets the vote, uses it to exact demands" of a nation's economy.

In short, whether or not separate freedoms is the "only solution," as Viljoen insists, U.S. and United Nations threats of imposing economic sanctions (and to some extent the U.S., at least, is already applying them which, at the moment means only penalizing itself) will perpetuate apartheid.

Notes Anglo American Corp. Chairman Harry Oppenheimer, "The apartheid policy really only becomes plausible to the extent that a shortage of investment capital makes it impossible to provide jobs in the advanced sector (of South Africa's culture) for the numbers who would wish to enter it."

Thus, "the main effect of a shortage of investment capital will not be to reduce wages in European-controlled industry but to perpetuate the dual nature of the economy; and, on account of the absence of sufficient job opportunities in the advanced sector, to increase the size of the primitive subsistence sector."

By contrast, he points out, historically in South Africa the country's economy has grown "through the process of drawing Black peasants from the subsistence sector into the cash economy, first to do unskilled, repetitive jobs at very low wages in an economy which was, itself, relatively small and undeveloped; and, more recently, to take a growing part in a developed, sophisticated system."

In short, the U.S. "human rights" zealots, and others, are attempting to impose a political solution on what is, today at least, essentially an economic problem. Laws preventing social interaction are being abolished rapidly.

SYSTEM EMERGING

Thus, the political program that is shaping up in South Africa is explainable, if not indeed defendable, viewed from an economic perspective. And, says Martin Spring in his South African Newsletter, "Absence of international recognition (for Transkei and Bophuthatswana) won't halt this process. In fact, it could speed it up."

Genuine, viable administrations run by moderate blacks already are emerging in southern Africa, he claims. "If Moscow continues to promote subversion among educated young Blacks and the West persists in its deepfreeze treatment of moderate Black leaders, the latter will be forced into an ever-closer relationship with African Whites to ensure their survival and the political stability of the areas they rule."

The new political system shaping up in southern Africa will become clearer over the next five years, he says. Among the key building blocks already:

"Speedy negotiations with leaders of the Coloured people and Asians," says Viljoen, "to create as soon as possible and with the greatest possible degree of consensus, the planned framework within which they will share political responsibility."

For now, in which some observers speculate is an interim step (which "Coloureds" and "Indians" alike resent because, they say, they can't afford the cost and don't think will result in any significant political authority for them, anyway), a separate parliament is being set up for each of the three ethnic groups; they will jointly elect a U.S.-style executive president and he will serve with a top policymaking council consisting of ministers from all three groups.

The introduction of a program for accelerated development of the homelands, consolidating some of them—including some urban Black conglomerates—in White areas.

An "urgent program," Viljoen calls it, to accommodate the urban Black in White South Africa including (an) effective Black local city council government; "improved facitities to turn townships into full-fledged cities;" but, he adds, "A categorical denial of (national) political rights to urban Blacks except as citizens of the homelands (since) including them politically would disturb the balance of power."

And, as the homelands become more viable economically and more of their citizens become trained and experienced in running the machinery of government, creation of some sort of confederacy of these independent nation-States "for economic, technical and eventually military cooperation among them."

That will not sit well with those in the U.S. who persist in comparing the "South Africa problem" to the Black civil rights movement in the U.S. (when, except for the so-called "Coloureds" and "Indians," there's very little similarity at all.) But, says Spring, Western refusal to recognize the homelands' independence "won't stand up to analysis." Notes he:

"Western powers deny the concept of ethnic sovereignty in South Africa while trying to force it on Israel. They charge that homelands are 'puppets' while accepting representation of the Soviet provinces of Byelo-Russia and Ukraine as separate States at the United Nations."

"They claim homelands aren't truly independent because they're not economically viable, but don't apply this principle to countries like Lesotho, Botswana and Mozambique which also are economically dependent on South Africa. They jeer at the homelands' lack of territorial cohesion—but Alaska's separation from the Lower 48 States never seems to have been a problem."

"They say that allocation of only 13 percent of South Africa to the homelands (some of the richest land, incidentally) is unfair, inventing a new principle of land/population balance that they've never applied to the rest of the world."

"They suggest that it's dishonest to deny full political rights to Black workers in the White-primacy area on grounds that they're citizens of homelands; but never level this criticism at Kuwait (where 74% of the workers are foreign and they can't acquire citizenship) or Switzerland (almost one million foreigners with only a token number allowed to naturalize.)"

EMOTIONALLY BIASED

Reporting in the Western Press, and even in some of the South African Press, is hardly notable for its balanced fairness. They banner-headline Transkei's "declaration of war" on South Africa, for instance, but don't report one week later that, in the aftermath of a disastrous flood, she asked South Africa for rescue aid.

They applaud the "tough stand against apartheid" taken by the dictator-run central Black African States; but fail to mention that South Africa ignores the insults and goes right on providing trade and technical assistance to those same States—South Africa being in several cases about the only support that's keeping those States from total economic ruin.

They eulogize a black radical named Steve Biko into international martyrdom, though he was little-known in his own country beforehand, hang on every word of an "expert" named Donald Woods, who was really a flack for Black radical movements in South Africa before the Government let him get out of the country; and denigrate the "stubborn Afrikaner" for "keeping Blacks in virtual slavery."

But they don't report that the White South African taxpayer is spending $12 per capita in aid to the homelands from an economy with a gross national products of only about $40 billion annually. (U.S. foreign aid per capita is only about $1.76.) Nor do they mention that while the United Nations was spending, between 1962 and 1972, $261 million on underdeveloped countries, South Africa spent $486 million on Blacks, alone.

Some examples of the results:

An 11-year, $550 million housing development for "Coloured" (racially mixed) people in Mitchell's Plain outside Capetown which, when completed in 1983, will provide houses for 250,000 persons. Since 1950 to date South African authorities have built nearly 450,000 brick and prefabricated homes for Blacks throughout South Africa, an achievement unmatched anywhere else on the continent.

A tripling over the past 20 years in the number of trained teachers being educated for the Black communities and the equivalent of four new schools being opened for Blacks every working day last year—and a commitment to up that to about seven a day in the future to keep up with the population explosion.

A physician-per-population ratio in the homelands that is sixth best in Africa and a ratio for blacks outside the homelands (in places like Soweto) that is third best on the continent—and, like housing, the cost is nearly all subsidized by the White taxpayer.

A multi-million-dollar investment in agricultural development such as the Keiskamaha irrigation project in Ciskei to teach Blacks how to grow enough food not only for their own populations but for export. (South Africa's farmers produce about 25% of Africa's total food. The central Black African States, once food exporters, mostly now have to import food since they kicked the "white colonial" expertise out of the country.)

The development of a multi-million-dollar seaport complex at Richard's Bay on South Africa's eastern shore which could provide thousands of jobs, including skilled ones, to Blacks (mostly Zulus) in the area—if the Nation's economic growth could be speeded up.

Notes American newspaper publisher John McGoff, "I've been going there (to South Africa) for many years; and I've seen dramatic changes in the economic status of the Black man, changes in his opportunity for education."

Adds Allegheny Ludlum Steel Corporation President Richard Simmons, "We're particularly pleased that (South African corporations) have moved to employ Blacks in such large numbers, and for a total range of positions within plants. We think this is a constructive approach to the problems of upgrading the economic status of all of the citizens of South Africa. We think it is the only approach to the ultimate resolution of some of the problems that face South Africa today."

Sums up Father Kenneth Jadoff, Catholic Archdiocese in New York, "When we talk about moral principles, we have to be very careful to distinguish that, yes, racism is wrong; but to be quite practical, some of the things we're doing are a lot better than just removing ourselves completely from the situation.

"Strides are being taken to incorporate the Blacks much more into the political process. And I think you'll find out that it's because the multinational (corporations) are there that this is happening."

Concludes Anthony de Crespigny, professor of political science at the University of Cape Town, "Democracy is radically inhibited when inequalities, especially of wealth and status, are widespread and severe; when societies are markedly diverse with respect to language, race, religion and culture, and the differences . . . mutually reinforcing; when there are distinct permanent minorities whose legitimate interests can be safely disregarded; when there is no strong tradition of commitment to such democratic values as tolerance and respect for individual liberties; when the armed forces are wholly loyal to a government which is hostile towards a one-man, one-vote competitive system (as it is in most of Black-run Africa.)

"Those who want South Africa to become a democracy would scarcely be happy with the kind of one-party state regime which, while granting everyone the right to vote, proceeds to render this right worthless by insuring that it constitutes neither a source of influence nor a restraint on government."

More succinctly, says one South African "Indian community" leader, "They've got one-man, one-vote in Bombay—and two million people go to sleep on the sidewalks, hungry, every night." Unfortunately, maybe even tragically for the U.S. if it continues, current Federal perceptions of what's really happening in South Africa, and the policies derived in reaction seem roughly equivalent to what President Jimmy Carter might do "for the people of the United States" if he spent most of his time learning about their "needs" by talking to the Weathermen, the Black Panthers and the American Nazi Party.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Also, Mr. President, I would like to have printed at this point in the RECORD a list of about 60 or 65 large and small American concerns coming under the title of Emergency Committee for American Trade, who are supporting the amendment I have offered.

There being no objection. the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. GOLDWATER. In other words, Mr. President, what we are doing if we pass this section 25 in the bill and do not amend it out is to just say to Commerce and State, "You have one more power that, if used in the reckless way you have used it in the past, can just add to the economic problems of our own country."

I recall being in Africa the day that Mrs. Kreps of Commerce placed an embargo on all replacement parts for any equipment that had been sold to the police departments of South Africa.

Well, that caused them some consternation, but it caused more consternation to the American companies over there, who called and said, "What is going on in our country when they tell us we cannot sell things to our friends down here, when we are in business down here, paying taxes not only to them, but paying taxes back in the United States?"

These were not items that can be used in war. They were items to try and keep peace and quiet, from police action, just as we do in this country.

So the embargo list could be enlarged and enlarged and enlarged and, in my humble opinion, it is not going to do any good at all. The great harm it will do will further diminish the economic power of the United States, diminish the value of the dollar around the world, and hasten the day, Mr. President, and we are on that path and we are going much faster than any of us want to admit, that we are going to become a socialized America, an America whose economy will not be the strong, stable one it has always been.

Mr. President, for the time being, that is all I have, and I will yield the floor, but reserve the remainder of my time.

EXPORT LICENSE REQUIREMENTS

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support this amendment to revise that section of this bill which requires the U.S. Government to subject export items having "significant" political-military implications to validated license procedures and to refer them to the Secretary of State for review prior to approval by the Department of Commerce. Such a provision, in my opinion, is unneeded and unwise.

It is unneeded because the Export Administration Act already authorizes the control of U.S. exports for foreign policy reasons. Indeed, in one of the two cases cited in the committee report that gave rise to the amendment—the proposed sale of tank-carrying trucks to Libya—the administration has a procedure for controlling such exports and has announced its intention to deny the sale under the foreign policy authority of the existing Export Administration Act. In the other case, the sale of helicopters to Uganda took place in 1971, before we became aware of the intolerable behavior of the Amin regime.

The expansion of validated export license requirements is unwise for several reasons. First, no guidance is given on what is meant by the term "significant" political-military implications, who is to make that determination or how. Experience under the Export Administration Act demonstrates that the bureaucracy invariably errs on the side of expanded controls and would include as many items as possible in that category. These could include agricultural products as well as manufactured goods. Decisions as to whether they should be exported could take weeks if not months. In some cases the Government has taken more than a year to decide. American exporters—manufacturers and farmers alike—already burdened by an increasingly array of U.S. Government restrictions and indecisions on their overseas business would likely lose the sales to foreign competitors whose governments are far more supportive of their exporters than our own.

Second, do we really want to impose an additional unnecessery burden on our export trade at a time when the dollar is declining on world markets, our trade deficit is growing, and protectionism is on the rise throughout this nation?

Third, the amendment does not differentiate treatment among countries to which we sell our exports. What foreign policy purpose is served by putting export items in a category that would delay shipments to Israel, for example, or to other countries with which the United States has close and friendly relations?

RECONSIDER NEXT YEAR

In short, the proposal is ill-considered. It was tacked on the bill in committee without hearings and without sufficient time to consider its implications.

If experience suggests that changes should be made in the procedures by which export items are controlled for foreign policy reasons, then let them be proposed next year. The Export Administration Act expires on September 30, 1979. The Banking Committee will hold extensive hearings early in the year. The Congress, in considering renewal of the act, could at that time weigh carefully the costs and benefits of changes affecting foreign policy controls. By acting hastily now, we could do irreparable damage to our foreign policy as well as our foreign trade.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it is the intention of the leadership to complete action on this bill today. Therefore, I would suggest that Senators who have amendments be prepared to call them up promptly.

A good many amendments have to be disposed of and I hope it will not have to be too late, but if it takes until 9 or 10 o'clock, we will be here.

So I just thought Senators should be informed by the cloakrooms accordingly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ZORINSKY). Who yields time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I ask that the time be charged against the time of the Senator from Alabama, not mine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for the quorum call will be charged to the Senator from Alabama.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Robert Paquin and Susan Branigan, of my staff, have the privilege of the floor throughout the remainder of the day, during votes and debate on the pending measure or any other measures or amendments that come up today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. GOLDWATER. With the same provision, Mr. President, that the time be charged against the other side.

Mr. LEAHY. I understand that the time will be charged against the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, my time is being used up fast. Could we have unanimous consent that the time not be charged to either side?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator make that request?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I make this request.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am ready to proceed. We are waiting here for somebody to oppose this or accept it. I do not want to waste my time with quorum calls, if we cannot get the opposition here to oppose this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona object?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I renew my request for a quorum call, and I ask that the time be charged to my time on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Who yields time?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, the request that I am going to make has been cleared with——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time to the Senator?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator is going to make a unanimous-consent request. Go ahead.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia has asked me if it will be all right to set my amendment aside because the opposition is deliberating over my amendment and this will give them more time to deliberate, and we can take up the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator does not need anyone to yield for a unanimous-consent request.

I ask unanimous consent that the amendment of Mr. GOLDWATER be temporarily laid aside and Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., may proceed to call up his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1497

(Purpose: Strike $40 million for Southern Africa)

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.), for himself and Mr. HELMS, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1497.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 7, line 13, strike "$1,972,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,932,000,000."

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, this amendment is straightforward. If adopted it would eliminate $40 million from the bill. It would cut by $40 million the amount of funds authorized for aid to the countries surrounding Rhodesia.

This money was not requested by the administration. It was added in committee.

The administration requested roughly $70 million for the purpose of providing support to the countries which surround Rhodesia and which are taking some economic losses because of the on-going conflict in that region.

I do not believe it is appropriate to add to the funds requested.

More than that, Mr. President, it is my understanding that roughly 50 percent of the funds authorized and appropriated last year are not even committed at this time. How foolish is this Congress going to get? In the first place, it seems to me a very foolish proposal to appropriate tax funds to alleviate the damage being done by the Communist guerrillas operating outside of the borders of Rhodesia. But if the Senate insists on such use of tax funds, certainly it ought not to go beyond the amount requested by the administration.

I think this extra $40 million put in by the committee, not requested by the administration or the State Department, should be eliminated.

I would hope that the committee would accept this amendment, knock out this $40 million, which still leaves $70 million in the bill for the purposes stated.

I reserve the remainder of my time, but, before I do so, I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator and I thank the Chair.

I commend the Senator for his amendment and I would be honored if he would add me as a cosponsor.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I would be delighted.

I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Carolina be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, we have asked Senator CLARK be present to discuss this matter. Senator CLARK is the chairman of the African Subcommittee, and he was instrumental, as I recall, in approving this particular amendment.

I am told he is on his way.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It is correct, is it not, that approximately 50 percent of the funds authorized and appropriated last year is not yet obligated?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, under the circumstances, I ask unanimous consent that we may call for a quorum and that the time be charged to both sides.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator from New York amend his request so that the time will not be charged to either side?

Mr. JAVITS. That is fine with me. I meant my request to call for time not be charged to either side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request? Without objection, it is so orderd.

Mr. JAVITS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we may lay aside temporarily the amendment of the Senator from Virginia and return to the amendment of the Senator from Arizona and that the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) be recognized for the purpose of submitting either an amendment or a substitute, if that is agreeable to the Senator from Arizona because it deals with the time question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Illinois is recognized.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1498

(Purpose: To clarify the authority to control exports under the Export Administration Act)

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) proposes an amendment in the nature of a substitute numbered unprinted amendment 1498.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

Strike out sections 22 and 25 of S. 3075 and insert at the end of the bill the following new section:

Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

(m)(1) With respect to any country engaged in activities which are detrimental to important political/military interests of the United States, any item which could have direct military application and could significantly assist such activities shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

(2) Crime control and detection instruments and equipment shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

(3) The Secretary of Commerce shall determine, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the types of transactions which shall be reviewed by the Secretary of State for the purposes of this subsection. The Secretary of State shall have 30 calendar days to conduct the reviews referred to in this subsection and at the the end of such period of time shall state his recommendation or his reasons for not making a recommendation.

(4) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to NATO, Japan, Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, section 25 of S. 3075 would require validated licenses for any export "which would have significant political or military implications for any region of the world except the NATO countries, Japan, Australia or New Zealand." That section in 3075 would require each such validated license application received by the Department of Commerce to be referred automatically to the Department of State for review.

The provision, section 25, was prompted by concern that the Department of State might not have adequate opportunity to review commercial exports of items which could directly support the military forces of foreign countries and, thereby, bear political, as well as military, implications inconsistent with U.S. foreign policy interests.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona deletes that section.

The amendment which I offer as a substitute for his amendment would restrict the applicability of section 25 to exports.

Its main purpose is to involve the State Department in the process for the control of exports which could have serious military or political implications for the United States.

This substitute would require, with respect to any country engaged in activities which are detrimental to significant political-military interests of the United States, validated licenses for exports of any item which could have direct military application and could assist such activities.

The Department of State and the Department of Commerce would consult and cooperate both in the determination of which exports should be subject to validated license control and which license applications should be reviewed by the Department of State as well as the Department of Commerce.

The substitute amendment would address only items which could have direct military application and could significantly assist activities detrimental to important U.S. political-military interests.

The purpose, Mr. President, is not to encourage more controls of exports or more delays in the processing of export license applications. On the contrary, the purpose is to rationalize this process and involve the State Department only when there are significant political or military considerations to take into account.

Mr. President, it is not intended that this amendment would require any validated license procedures with respect to exports of agricultural commodities or most consumer goods and capital goods. It would apply only to such items as could have direct military applications, such as trucks, helicopters, jeeps, and aircraft. The purpose of the substitute is to clarify the intent of Congress in the Export Administration Act that potential exports which could be damaging to U.S. foreign policy and security interests be screened by the appropriate departments of the Federal Government before the transaction is completed.

The Department of State, together with the Departments of Commerce and Defense, should review such transactions. They presently have the authority, under the Export Administration Act, to require validated licenses for such exports and to review applications to export such items; but this amendment would make clear the intent of Congress that such authority should be exercised with diligence in screening potential exports to countries which may be engaged in activities which are detrimental to significant political or military interests of the United States.

Finally, Mr. President, the Export Administration Act is under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking. That act expires next year. Consequently, this whole subject will receive serious consideration——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would interrupt the Senator from Illinois for a moment to notify the Senator from Illinois that his substitute amendment is not in order for that of the Senator from Arizona, inasmuch as the amendment hits a section in the bill not covered by the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I modified the amendment to strike out the reference on the first line to section 22, and also to strike out subparagraph (2) and renumber subparagraph (3) as (2) and subparagraph (4) as (3).

I believe with that modification the amendment is in order as a substitute; am I not correct?

The effect of this modification, Mr. President, is to confine this substitute amendment to section 25, which is the section to which the amendment by the Senator from Arizona is addressed.

Mr. President, I send the modification in writing to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct. He may modify his amendment, and the amendment will be so modified.

The Senator from Illinois may proceed.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, is the amendment now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is now in order.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

Strike out section 25 of S. 3075 and insert at the end of the bill the following new section:

Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

(m)(1) With respect to any country engaged in activities which are detrimental to important political/military interests of the United States, any item which could have direct military application and could significantly assist such activities shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

Crime control and detection instruments and equipment shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

(2) The Secretary of Commerce shall determine, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the types of transactions which shall be reviewed by the Secretary of State to carry out the purposes of this subsection. The Secretary of State shall have 30 calendar days to conduct the reviews referred to in this subsection and at the end of such period of time shall state his recommendation or his reasons for not making a recommendation.

(3) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or to Japan, Australia or New Zealand.

Mr. STEVENSON. Finally, Mr. President, the Export Administration Act and the subject of exports and export controls generally is within the jurisdiction of the Committee on Banking, and the Export Administration Act expires next year. Consequently we will, in the Banking Committee, give this whole subject of export controls for political and national security as well as economic reasons through study, and we intend to begin that study with hearings this year.

So it is probable that we are addressing ourselves to proposals which, if approved, will be of short duration, and speaking only for myself—and I offer this amendment on behalf of myself and the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE)—the provisions of this amendment can, I believe, be improved upon, and will be, with further attention by Congress and by the Committee on Banking.

But in the meantime, this amendment, if approved, would, without involving the State Department in the review of virtually all exports, give that Department, the appropriate Department, an opportunity to get involved in the review of exports which could have important political or national security implications for the United States.

It will probably make very little difference in existing packages; the State Department and the Department of Defense are already involved. But it would give expression to congressional intent in that respect, and, where the political implications are important, it seems appropriate to me that the political departments, that is to say the Department of State in this case, should be involved.

For those reasons, Mr. President, I am very hopeful that the distinguished managers of this bill will support the substitute amendment, and that the Senate will as well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I might say to my friend from Illinois that if his intent is merely to get the Secretary of State to act, he could do this——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Arizona wants to speak in opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, he has 15 minutes in which to speak.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I call to the attention of the Senator's staff that he could get the Secretary of State into this merely by amending a provision on military articles which is in the existing law. It also includes the 30-day provision mentioned by the Senator from New York.

My objection to this whole approach, and the reason I want to strike section 25, is that I do not think it is needed, but if the Senator wants to expand the review power to include the Secretary of State, because the language I am referring to already includes review by the Secretary of Defense and other provisions of the law includes the Secretary of Commerce, we could do it in a much more simple way by having either the committee or the Senator from Illinois offer an amendment to include the Secretary of State in one of these existing provisions.

I will just say I appreciate the efforts of the Senator. I believe this compromise amendment is a substantial improvement over the present provision. However, it still has bad weaknesses. No matter how narrow the amendment is drafted, it clearly adds a new and expanded review authority to the very broad powers which the President already has to withhold exports. I do not know why we have to give the President any new power at this time.

If we happen to be in a war, that would be an entirely different thing. He has the authority, for example, to stop selling computers to Russia. He has the authority to actually stop selling armament to any country he wants to. Under the very vague definition of political-military implications, I think we could very easily cover food by that because it is an old axiom of war that an army marches on its belly. The very first thing that any military effort being planned has to take into cognizance is the availability of food.

We thought the Senator from Illinois was going to exclude food, but it is not exempted on the face of his amendment. I merely point that out as one of the untidy parts of this whole approach.

Most importantly, the Senator's amendment would subject numerous export products to a validated license procedure which now can be exported with what is called a general license.

I might say, Mr. President, that the complaint I am receiving from businessmen in this country, large and small, is the juggling act that goes on about these licenses. I hate to keep referring to aircraft, but I am more acquainted with that field. Where the license exists one day it does not exist the next day, and they even go so far as to penalize the pilot who is ferrying the aircraft for violations which might have been brought about through decisions of the company.

Also, I am still troubled by great uncertainty as to what the term "political-military interest" means. I think I know but it is not spelled out. It is so broad that, again, food certainly can get into this. I cannot think of one solid thing that Commerce, the Secretary of State, or the Secretary of Defense could not say has a political-military interest. As I mentioned earlier, light aircraft, which are bought in great numbers by countries in South Africa, can be indicated as having military interests only because they fly. This is under "national security" provisions of existing law. I imagine they could be used for observation and you might call it a military aircraft, but that is stretching it all over hell's half acre.

The same law that I am talking about authorizes the President to deny exports of any items "to further significantly the foreign policy of the United States."

We do not argue with that.

This is certainly broad enough to cover the political aspects of the Senator's amendment.

Thus, both political and military interests of the United States can be taken into account under present law.

I repeat, I do not see any need to go through the drill of having a whole new section of this act made into law when we already have a strong law. I will agree that it expires on September 30 of next year, but I think next year is the time to talk about these things. I think the whole world will be a different picture next pear. We may want to change some of the language of existing law when it comes up for renewal, if it does.

I get back to one complaint of mine. It is that we only except coverage of countries in NATO, Japan, Australia, or New Zealand. We export a lot of things to Mexico, and they are friendly to us. We export a lot of things to Latin countries which are friendly to us—not all of them, but some of them. Panama certainly must be called a friendly country. If they are not, I do not know what we have to do to make friends. But the amendment does not exclude Panama. We cannot ship certain items to them without the consent of the Secretary of Commerce or the Secretary of State, under the substitute.

So, Mr. President, I get back to my basic argument that we do not need section 25. If the Banking Committee or the Foreign Relations Committee wants to include the Secretary of State, all they have to do is to modify the existing language which will accomplish, I believe, everything that the Senator wants to accomplish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I am hopeful that the next Congress, after hearings by the appropriate committee, will take action to rationalize the strict line of export control procedures giving the Departments of Defense and State an appropriate role, along with the Department of Commerce, where there are political and military implications. I agree with most if not all of the concerns which have been expressed about the present procedure by the distinguished Senator, my good friend from Arizona.

In the first place, the existing law to which he referred cannot be amended to include the Secretary of State to accomplish the purposes sought to be accomplished by this substitute amendment. I do not believe it can be because the provision to which he is referring applies, I believe, to only those countries to which all exports of strategic commodities are controlled. That is to say, only Communist countries. And then only if the exports would prove detrimental to the national security of the United States.

Here the reach is global. It recognizes the political and military implications can be significant in non-Communist countries, and that they may go beyond the traditional scope of national security considerations.

As for food, we certainly do not intend this to apply to food, but, as the Senator pointed out, an army does march on its belly. If an army is marching against the United States or against allies of the United States, if Iraq should attack Israel, the Congress should not be in the position of having deprived the President of the opportunity to control exports to that hostile country or to imply that such is the intent of the Congress. But such circumstances in which the authority might be used with respect to agricultural commodities are very difficult for this Senator, at least, to conceive. I do think it would be wrong to imply that in no circumstances could the United States resort to what could be a strong political weapon.

Mr. President, I have no more to add on this subject. I do hope that the Senate will approve this substitute, bearing in mind that the law is not in a satisfactory condition and recognizing the concerns which the distinguished Senator from Arizona has expressed. There will be a review of the law and there will be an opportunity to make further changes in the next Congress.

Mr. SCHMITT. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Illinois has expired on this amendment.

Mr. SCHMITT. Will the Senator from Arizona yield to me for 5 minutes?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Yes; I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. I have anticipated with the distinguished Senator from Illinois a number of hearings relating to national trade policy or, in some cases, the lack of a national trade policy. This issue is further related to that.

As the Senator from Arizona has indicated, the business community and the manufacturing community have, again and again, felt that legitimate sales of nonmilitary significance have been lost because of the process by which evaluation of the sale and, in some cases, licensing of the sale takes place. Would the Senator from Illinois indicate who would make the decision on whether the Secretary of State would get involved in the particular sale? Would that be the decision of the Secretary of State, or would the Secretary of Commerce make that decision under this amendment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, under this amendment, the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of State would cooperatively determine which countries are engaged in activities which are detrimental to important political-military interests and, also, the categories of export commodity which could have direct military application. Having made those determinations, the Department of Commerce would implement them.

Mr. SCHMITT. So between the two Secretaries, some guidelines would be established that would trigger the Secretary of State's review; is that correct?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; the Secretary of State, under this amendment, as modified as the result of a suggestion from the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), would have 30 calendar days to conduct his review. At the end of that period of time, he would have to make his recommendation or, if no recommendation, explain why. That provision is intended to expedite this process. I think that by clarifying the role of the Secretary, this amendment could expedite the process.

As the distinguished Senator from New Mexico knows, the Secretary of State is already involved and, as a matter of fact, there are growing indications that other agencies, including the National Security Council, are getting involved, sometimes bypassing the Department of Defense and the Department of State. So this amendment could help to focus the responsibility for assessment of political and military implications and not only make that assessment more wise, but also accelerate it.

Mr. SCHMITT. Would the Senator from Illinois expect that, at the conclusion of the 30-day period, if no action has been taken and no explanation has been forthcoming, the sale could proceed?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; recognizing that it might be in the interest of the United States to leave the decision in abeyance pending actions by the recipient country, the Secretary could decide not to approve or disapprove. But if he makes such a decision, he would have to give the reasons. The reason for giving him that option is a fairly obvious one, I believe, that foreign countries only have to wait a fixed period of time. That is all they have to do, wait a fixed period of time and then engage in whatever action is offensive to the United States. For whatever leverage there is in export controls, it seems to me it behooves us to preserve this option, this carrot, by not insisting on a premature decision by the Secretary of State, but to bring pressure to bear on the Secretary of State, his reasons for not acting would have to be explained.

Mr. SCHMITT. Finally, it is the Senator's intent that the guidelines that would be developed for the two Secretaries would be applied on a case-by-case basis and he would review the circumstances. I believe he indicated that, in some circumstances, food might come under the definition of political or military implications, whereas in some cases it might not. In some cases, an airplane might, in others not. Is that correct?

Mr. STEVENSON. Well, by "case by case," we assume the Departments will establish categories of countries; then, for those countries, categories of commodities; and that in that two-step procedure, very few countries would be taken up and very few commodities. Of course, if they were, the export could still go ahead. It would just require a validated license.

Mr. SCHMITT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I believe I may offer an amendment to the substitute amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair at this time would like to clarify the parliamentary situation. The amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois is a substitute for the section of the bill proposed to be stricken by the amendment of the Senator from Arizona. As such, it is a first-degree amendment and may be amended.

The Chair would also like to point out that, under the circumstances, the Senator from Illinois was to have 1 hour of debate. At this point, 30 minutes of that 1 hour remain for that debate. The substitute may be offered, as the Senator from Arizona had the parliamentary inquiry, at the expiration of the additional 30 minutes, or at this point, by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOLDWATER. In the absence of unanimous consent, I could amend my own amendment that is intended to be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator may not amend his own amendment because a motion to strike is not amendable.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I see. I have to get unanimous consent to attach an amendment to the substitute amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. At this point, he would have to have unanimous consent, as time remains, 30 minutes, on the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I see.

I have time left, do I not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona proposes to strike a section of the bill.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Or add a section—no, my amendment is to strike the section, yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the precedents of the Senate when an amendment is offered to substitute for a section that is proposed to be stricken, if the substitute is agreed to, the amendment to strike is not acted on.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I am going to offer the amendment and I will ask the Chair to rule.

At the end of the substitute amendment add: The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils or animal hides or skins.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator wishes to propose that as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, such an amendment will be in order at the expiration of the additional time of 30 minutes, or by unanimous consent at this point in the debate.

Mr. GOLDWATER. What is the time situation now? I thought we were out of time.

Mr. STEVENSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is a first-degree amendment and is limited to 1 hour of debate rather than the 30 minutes which the Chair stated originally.

Mr. STEVENSON addressed the Chair.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I get half of that; is that right?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No; the manager of the bill gets half, unless he favors the amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) may be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent it be in order for the Senator from Arizona to offer his amendment at this time, if there is no objection by the distinguished managers of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none; it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1499

(Purpose: To exclude certain agricultural commodities from export countries.)

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I send the amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) proposes UP amendment number 1499 to the Stevenson UP amendment number 1498, as modified:

At the end of the substitute amendment add:

"(4) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils or animal hides or skins."

Mr. GOLDWATER. I might say to my friend from Illinois that if he will accept this amendment, I would be very favorably inclined toward accepting his amendment, as modified, to my amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I sense a sound compromise in the making, although I have not had an opportunity to discuss it with the distinguished managers of the bill.

There is one point I think should be clarified about this amendment to the substitute amendment.

As I understand it, it applies only to the export control provisions in the substitute amendment. That is to say, it would not affect other export control authorities in the law, as in the case already postulated of hostilities between a friendly country and an unfriendly country; the United States would not, under some other provision of the law, be prevented from controlling exports of foodstuffs to an enemy.

If the amendment offered by the Senator is, as I believe he indicated, confined to the export control authorities that would be established by this amendment, I think it would be a sound amendment and I would have no objection to it.

But I think it should be made clear, indeed, it is the intent, that it does not go beyond the substitute amendment to imply or deprive the President of, for example, his foreign policy and short supply export control authorities that are elsewhere in the law.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I might call my colleague's attention to his amendment. It covers:

Any item which could have direct military application and could significantly assist such activities shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

I do not think any of us can argue against the idea that food in time of war—I am not speaking of in time of peace; that in time of war—becomes one of our great weapons because we are the world's greatest producer.

I think, for example, Russia would starve without our wheat, and I cannot think of a faster way to stop military exploits by the Soviets against us than to deny her our wheat.

But I think it could be done under the powers of the President now, with special safeguards for review by the Secretary of Agriculture. I think under the powers of the President we do not even need this additional section. That is what I am debating about.

But as long as the new section is to be in there, I would hope the Senator would accept the language I suggest.

So I would agree with him that my amendment applies only to the language in his amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, that would be the understanding, that this amendment to my amendment does not go beyond the amendment to affect the other export control authorities of the President in the law.

I have no objection to the amendment. I think it is a sound amendment.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I do not want to prolong things; we will have a long enough session without this. With that understanding, I will accept the amended substitute and ask that we vote on it.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back my time.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE. The Senator does not want a record vote?

Mr. GOLDWATER. Not now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators having yielded back their time on the Goldwater amendment to the Stevenson amendment, the question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

So UP amendment No. 1499 to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as amended.

Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. GOLDWATER. I yield back my time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois, as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Illinois, to strike and insert a section of the bill that the amendment of the Senator from Arizona attempted to strike, having been adopted, the question will now recur on the amendment of the Senator from Arizona to strike that section.

The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The Senator from Virginia is recognized.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Ann Curry, of my staff, have the privilege of the floor.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1497

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes for the purpose of addressing questions to the manager of the bill. Will the distinguished Senator from Alabama take the floor so that I may ask several questions?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. I am making an effort to get Senator CLARK here.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I just want to ask a few questions.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Very well.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How many countries are involved in this fund which the administration has recommended of $69 million, which the committee increased by $40 million? I ask the manager of the bill how many countries are involved in the use of that fund?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I have just been checking the record, and it appears that there are five countries for which the administration requested the aid. Those five countries are included in the committee's bill.

In addition, there are emergency increases for regional programs. I intend to put this in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator put in the RECORD the names of the five countries involved?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes; we can do that.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Perhaps he will read the five names.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Botswana, Lesotho, Mozambique, Swaziland, Zambia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Under the current law, is it not prohibited to distribute funds to Mozambique?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I believe there was an amendment to that effect accepted on the floor last year. But the President has the power to waive that.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I understand. But including Mozambique in this legislation, as the committee proposes to do is a departure from current law.

I read from the current law which was approved last year:

No assistance may be furnished under this section to Mozambique, Angola, Tanzania or Zambia, except that the President may waive this prohibition with respect to any such country if he determines, and so reports to the Congress, that furnishing such assistance to that country would further the foreign policy interests of the United States.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The administration has indicated half a million for Mozambique, and that message, I understand, is coming to Congress; and he will exercise his right to waive the provision.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. He has the right; but if the proposal by the committee is accepted, then it is Congress that is waiving it. If the President wants to waive it, it is one thing; but it is another thing if Congress waives it.

There is a definite prohibition in today's law which prevents the use of funds for Mozambique as well as three other countries, unless the President waives it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The President has indicated his intention to waive it, and we are expecting such a waiver notice from the President.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Would the distinguished manager of the bill not be inclined to go along with the same proposal that is in the law now and incorporate that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Unless and until the President waives it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes; that is in the law now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The indication is that he is going to waive it and is going to send us a notice to that effect.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. But would the distinguished Senator from Alabama be willing to incorporate in the new bill the precise language of the current bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BURDICK). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. There would be no objection if the Senator wishes to offer that. There would be no objection on the part of the committee.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I appreciate that.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As I said, we assume that that is what is going to happen.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I appreciate that.

May I, then, do it this way: I ask unanimous consent to set aside the pending amendment temporarily, so that I may offer the precise language that is in the current bill as an amendment to this bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. My understanding is that the Senator has this language already in the current law.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. And it seems to me if he would simply offer that as an amendment to the pending proposal it would clear the decks.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, does the Senator intend to offer this now?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thought it might clear the atmosphere a little bit to offer it now. It is the same language as current law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We have the current law. In fact I have it here.

Mr. CASE. We are still on reservation of an objection.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We are perfectly willing to accept the amendment with that understanding.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Then I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, can we deal with this whole thing right now?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I see no reason why we cannot.

As I understand the Senator's amendment it does nothing to interfere with the right the President has now under the current law.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is correct. That is precisely the language in the current law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to set aside temporarily the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, reserving the right to object.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Then I plan to offer this amendment that the Senator has agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is all right.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I must set aside the other one first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1500

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, this amendment will be in order notwithstanding the order recognizing the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1500:

On page 7, after line 18, insert the following:

"(d) No assistance may be furnished under this section to Mozambique, Angola, Tanzania, or Zambia, except that the President may waive this prohibition with respect to any such country if he determines (and so reports to the Congress) that furnishing such assistance to that country would further the foreign policy interests of the United States."

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield back my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1497

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, as I understand it the pending business is the original Byrd amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the original amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I have a couple of additional questions I wish to ask the manager of the bill at this time.

How are these funds distributed and to whom are they distributed? I know the countries. But what are the mechanics of distributing the funds?

Mr. SPARKMAN. During the past 2 years the funds were used with great effectiveness to support fundamental economic development in southern Africa. That is one.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. My question is, How are the funds distributed?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I will come to that question.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. All right.

Mr. SPARKMAN. We do have a detailed list as to the various projects that we will put in the RECORD.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. But what the Senator from Virginia is anxious to know is this: The funds are turned over to one of these five governments; is that it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. If we can wait until we get that—I understood we are getting a copy of that.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Then another question is, How is the use of these funds monitored? Who monitors the use of the funds?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I think that would be included in the statement. It is the AID program, the Agency for International Development.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How much has been distributed to each of the five countries during this past year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am told that the distribution has been very low due to the fact that it is the first year and just getting started.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. If it were possible I think it is important to know what countries have benefited from these tax funds, to what extent, what monitoring has been done, and to whom has it been turned over in these countries. I am not convinced that all this foreign aid that we spend gets down to helping the people whom we claim we are trying to help. I do not know how much has been siphoned off.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am told it is being used—the principal objectives of the program have been transportation, rural roads, refugees—I would say those are the principal ones. But the paper that I do propose to furnish will list all of them, the amounts, and show how they do comply with the existing law.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I reserve the remainder of that time, and with the approval of the Senator from Alabama, may I ask unanimous consent for a short quorum call with the time divided equally between the Senator from Alabama and the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I wonder if we might withhold that since I have a list, the list that I mentioned to the Senator a while ago which we would furnish you, and we will have it printed in the RECORD.

We do have that list covering Botswana, Zambia, Lesotho, Malawi, Namibia, Swaziland.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How much money is involved in each of these countries?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The one I just mentioned is $5 million.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Which one?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Swaziland. Refugee program $5 million; animal disease prevention $4 million.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Is all of this in Swaziland?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is regional, I moved to regional, animal disease prevention, and regional transportation.

In Botswana there is a transport sector grant.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. How much was involved in that?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Nineteen million dollars.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Well, $19 million this past year?

Mr. SPARKMAN. These are proposed programs for next year.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I am speaking of the current year, the year we are in right now.

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is for the proposed programs. We do have the others though, and we can furnish it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. As I understan. the situation—and we are on the Senator from Alabama's time. as I understand it—of the funds which were appropriated last year for this current year, only half of those funds have been obligated. What I am trying to find out is which countries are involved in those funds and to what extent.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is speaking of the current year?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The amount for 1978 is estimated at $115 million, and the country breakdown for Botswana is about $16 million; Lesotho is $4.9 million. Those are AID funds.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I am looking at the law here. The law says:

> Of the funds authorized to be appropriated by section 532 for the fiscal year 1978, $80 million shall be available.

It did not authorize $115 million. Also Botswana was limited to $15 million and not the figure the Senator from Alabama mentioned.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The limitation that the Senator speaks of was the regional limitation. There are additional items beyond the regional; in other words, certain specific programs, all of which are AID programs for individual countries.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Let me see now, if we could take it step by step that would be helpful. As I understand it, reading from the law here, the total amount authorized to be appropriated was $80 million. Now, of that $80 million how much has been obligated?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The total authorized was $115 million. There are different programs. There are the regional funds and then there are funds for specific countries or specific programs.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. We are talking about the southern African special requirement funds, are we not?

Mr. SPARKMAN. As of May, let me say to the Senator, $42 million had been obligated.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Which is roughly half of the $80 million authorized.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator mentioned a larger figure than $80 million. What was that figure?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That would include regional and certain specific programs. That was a special regional fund of $80 million, and then $35 million for specific country programs.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I am looking at the law here, and the law says there shall be a maximum of $80 million, of which $45 million will be for regional programs.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Some of these funds are allotted to different programs in different countries and may involve two, three, or four different countries in the region.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The way I read the law, and if the Senator from Alabama reads it differently I wish he would let me know, I have the law in front of me:

> Southern African special requirements funds. Of the funds authorized to be appropriated by section 532 for the fiscal year 1978, $80 million shall be available only for the countries of southern Africa.

Then it has a breakdown on that. Section 2 says:

> Of the funds made available under this section, not more than the following amounts may be made available for the following: Botswana $15 million; Lesotho $15 million; Swaziland $5 million; regional programs for education, training, and refugee assistance $45 million.

Are there other sections of the bill which incorporate additional funds for these programs?

Mr. SPARKMAN. These funds that are listed as being regional may actually apply to certain programs which affect more than one country, such as transportation or such as education, and refugees that I mentioned a while ago.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Well, Mr. President, I would like to get back to this matter at a later time. It can be done either by my presenting another amendment and discussing it, or by yielding on the bill. But at the moment, I am glad to yield back my time on this amendment if the Senator from Alabama would care to do so, and we could have a vote on it and get on with the bill.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, let me say just one thing. I believe that if the Senator would go into this more carefully—and we will supply him with a full statement as to the different countries and different amounts—he will find that what might seem to be a certain amount of confusion here growing out of the fact that some programs may apply to two or three different countries and two or three different categories would be cleared up.

I think we can supply you with the actual information that will show clearly what goes to what country, and projects in each specific country.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment, and I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time if the Senator from Alabama is prepared to do likewise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK). Is there a sufficient second? There is not a sufficient second.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LONG. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TALMADGE). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Does the Senator from Alabama yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1501

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) offers an unprinted amendment numbered 1501 to the unprinted amendment (No. 1497) of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, Jr.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey is not properly drafted as an amendment to the pending amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered in order as drafted.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is to a different part of the bill.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would like to know what the unanimous-consent proposal is.

Mr. CASE. I should think you would. I will be glad to tell you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Temporarily, I object.

Mr. CASE. You reserve the right to object?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I object. You can make your request later on.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I just want to say it is perfectly proper that we know what this proposed amendment would be, and I would like to have a chance to read it, or have the clerk read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment, and then the Senator will be recognized on his parliamentary inquiry.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 7, after line 18, insert the following:

"(d) Of the funds authorized to be appropriated for assistance to the countries of southern Africa $10 million shall be earmarked for humanitarian assistance to the people of Rhodesia and $10 million shall be earmarked for the establishment of or support for educational and vocational training programs for Rhodesia."

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I intend to offer that in a proper way to the proper time, and if technical changes have to be made, they will be made. I do not press it at this time, but I want the Senate to know before it votes on this amendment of the Senator from Virginia; Senator CLARK and I intend to offer it.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia wanted to make a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from Virginia will state it.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I think the parliamentary inquiry has already been answered. The Senator from New Jersey did not press the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CLARK. At what point would a quorum call be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A quorum call is in order at this point.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. CASE. I yield time on the bill for the quorum call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BURDICK). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the time on the amendment by Mr. PERCY be reduced from 4 hours to 2 hours. I have discussed this with him earlier and he said that it was agreeable to him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on the amendment which will be offered by the minority leader on which there is a 1½ hour time limitation, I ask unanimous consent that that time be reduced to 1 hour, and on another amendment by Mr. BAKER, on which there was to be a 1-hour time limitation, I ask that the time be reduced to 30 minutes, to be equally divided in accordance with the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1502

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) for himself and Mr. CLARK, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1502:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Virginia, insert the following:

"(b)(1)(a) $1,972,000,000. Of the funds authorized to be appropriated for assistance to the countries of southern Africa $10 million shall be earmarked for humanitarian assistance to the people of Rhodesia and $10 million shall be earmarked for the establishment of or support for educational and vocational training programs for Rhodesia."

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask that the RECORD show that the amendment is offered jointly by Senator CLARK and myself. I yield such time as he may desire to Senator CLARK on the amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I want to speak briefly to the amendment that is being amended, namely, the Byrd amendment cutting $40 million from southern Africa. Then I shall speak to the pending amendment in terms of trying to clarify exactly what I understand the amendment would do.

First, I wish to speak to the whole issue. I want, above all, to express great concern about the proposal to reduce the authorization for security supporting assistance for southern Africa.

I can think of few actions which the Senate might take which could do more to undermine our long-term commitment to peaceful, constructive change in that part of the world.

During the past 2 years, SSA has been used with great effectiveness to support fundamental economic development in southern Africa.

In Botswana, which, I might say, is a full-blown democracy, a large but sparsely populated and vulnerable country surrounded by South Africa, Namibia, and Rhodesia—the Government, despite turmoil and instability on its borders has maintained its deep commitment to human rights, constitutional democratic government, and nonracialism. We have, through SSA, sought to buttress Botswana's independence, build up its transportation and communications infrastructure, and help with the critical demands of development.

Lesotho, one of the poorest nations on Earth, is entirely surrounded by South Africa. It seeks to reduce its dependence on its giant neighbor and address the urgent needs of its people. Through SSA, we have helped Lesotho to do so, notably by assisting with a major road project which, when completed, will link remote parts of the country together as never before.

In Swaziland, which borders South Africa and Mozambique, Security Supporting Assistance has helped the Government promote economic development in the poor rural areas and maintain independence from two large and mutually suspicious neighbors.

Zambia is a nation whose cooperation has already proven of great importance in working toward a resolution of the Namibian impasse and whose assistance in peaceful resolution of the Rhodesian conflict will be even more essential. Here, through SSA, we seek to make a major contribution to the nation's economic stability. Zambia now faces a economic crisis due largely to the depressed price of copper in world markets. While we have at times had differences with Zambia, we are convinced that SSA—which will be used, through budget support, to address critical economic problems—are essential U.S. contribution to political stability in Zambia, and relate directly to that nation's ability and willingness to play a constructive role in the region.

The conflicts of southern Africa have led, finally, to refugee problems of enormous dimensions. The countries of the region have shown a determination to deal constructively with these tremendous human problems but, without our assistance, they would have been and will be much less able to do so. Here again, SSA is the key.

The amendment by the Senator from New Jersey addresses itself specifically to issues of refugees with regard to Rhodesia.

This program has given us the capability to respond quickly and constructively to the urgent development needs of Botswana, Zambia, Lesotho, and Swaziland, and to support their economic and political independence. SSA has permitted us, despite rapidly changing circumstances, to respond to human need of the most fundamental kind. Losing this capability would tie our hands in responding to these kinds of problems; it would also reduce our ability to influence recipient nations to carry out sound economic development programs and spread the benefits of progress to their people. The situation in southern Africa is particularly volatile: The countries of the region face special problems brought about by the continuing conflict in Rhodesia, the hopeful but still unsettled situation in Namibia, and the pervasive difficulties which flow from South African apartheid. SSA has been the U.S. response to this special set of problems.

For all of the above reasons, Mr. President, I must strongly urge my colleagues to oppose any effort to reduce the security supporting assistance program for southern Africa. The situation in this part of the world has changed rapidly; it will continue to be unpredictable and volatile. SSA will reduce the chances that external forces will succeed in exacerbating the situation. Only security supporting assistance will permit the United States the flexibility to respond quickly to new situations as they arise, in partnership with the governments of the area. Our commitment to this program is an investment in peaceful change in one of the most dangerous parts of the world. We have a creative and important role to play there. Only with SSA in my judgment, can we play that role.

I also wish to point out that the $110 million for southern Africa is less than the level appropriated last year for that region—$115 million. We should, at the very least, maintain the same general level of assistance, especially in view of the rapidly changing situation in the area.

Finally, we should look ahead to the time when Namibia and Zimbabwe are independent next year. We have reached a breakthrough in Namibia and if the western proposals are implemented the United States should have in reserve, funds which can be immediately made available to help that country get a start. The same applies to Rhodesia. The $40 million in SSA is a small amount to assist these two countries.

By way of clarification, Mr. President, let me say that, under the U.N. Participation Act, the United States cannot transfer any funds for use in Rhodesia. By that, I mean to the Government of Rhodesia or to groups within that country. That would be illegal under existing law. The $20 million could be used for Rhodesian refugees—I think that is the intent of this amendment—for refugees, for educational training of Rhodesians, or if an agreement is reached and a settlement is implemented. The money could be used in Rhodesia by the new government after sanctions are lifted.

The other $20 million in Security Supporting Assistance could be used for the other countries in southern Africa, including Namibia if the western proposals are implemented.

I want to make particularly clear that we are not talking about providing funds to the Rhodesian Government or to the Patriotic Front or some other group of that kind. We are talking about using the money for refugees and for educational purposes for Rhodesians, including people who live inside Rhodesia. It is not excluded to people outside. It can be Rhodesians wherever we find them. We are looking at the humanitarian aspects of this question wherever these people may live.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I do yield.

Mr. HELMS. The Senator is saying that any disbursement of funds under this amendment in the nature of a substitute, direct or indirect, to the Patriotic Front, would be unlawful.

Mr. CLARK. It would be unlawful, in my judgment, because that is not the intent of this amendment.

Mr. HELMS. That is the intent?

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. In that case, Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina asks to be made a cosponsor of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PELL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CLARK. I yield back the floor.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I do not believe anybody else wants to be heard on this. I am prepared to yield back the time if the opposition is prepared to do the same.

On behalf of the committee, I am prepared to yield back the committee's time and ask for a voice vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has been yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. I understand, Mr. President, that the Senator from Virginia is prepared to vacate——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I move to vacate the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE. I move the adoption of the amendment as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for recognition of Senator BAKER at this time be vitiated at his request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask for recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1503

(Purpose: To lift Rhodesian sanctions following free elections of a new government)

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), for himself, Mr. JAVITS and Mr. MOYNIHAN, proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1503.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

"SEC. 26. Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

"(1) by striking out the second and third sentences of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: no Executive Order which was issued under this subsection before the date of enactment of the Foreign Assistance Authorization Act, fiscal year 1979 and which applied measures against Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable before the beginning of fiscal year 1980: Provided, That the President of the United States determines that: (a) the Government of Rhodesia has committed itself to participate in, and negotiate in good faith, at an all-parties conference held under international auspices on all relevant issues, including the terms of majority rule and the protection of minority rights, the Anglo-American plan and the terms of the Salisbury Agreement, and (b) a Government has been installed, chosen by free elections in which all population groups have been allowed to participate freely, with observation by impartial internationally recognized observers.

"(2) by striking out subsections (b) and (c)."

On page 31, line 6, strike out "Sec. 26." and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 27.".

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is withdrawn.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield me I minute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Who yields time?

Mr. JAVITS. One minute?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey yields to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, He has yielded me 1 minute.

Mr. President, we are on the threshold of dealing with the Rhodesia situation. We felt that the orderly way to deal with the Rhodesia situation was for the Senator from North Carolina, because it has been brewing for a long time, to have the opportunity to present his amendment which raises the situation. Then Senator CASE and I wish to present our amendment as the alternate, as a substitute to that, and those matters within the debate.

That is the way in which we understood the matter was going to be handled and in which it was visualized.

Therefore, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senator HELMS may at this time, if he is ready, submit his amendment and that at the appropriate time Senator CASE may be recognized to submit our substitute amendment.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. What was the Senator's observation as to an understanding reached with me?

Mr. JAVITS. That the Senator would present his amendment and that we would present our amendment as a substitute, if the Senator is ready.

Mr. HELMS. My friend is mistaken, I have made no such agreement. I am not ready at the present time.

Of course, as the Senator is aware, I am not particularly interested in risking an amendment in the nature of a substitute in the present parliamentary situation. So I am still thinking about the problem.

I would be glad to enter into a time agreement, thereby reducing the time, I might say to my friend from New York, if the Senator from North Carolina could be assured the opportunity for a vote, even a tabling motion, on my amendment. But my concern, of course, as the Senator knows, is that there may be an amendment in the nature of a substitute and my amendment will never be voted on, even to the extent of a tabling motion.

That is my concern at the moment.

Mr. JAVITS. Well, I cannot assure the Senator of a vote because, after all, that is the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HELMS. It is up to the Senator from North Carolina to do the best he can in that regard—and that is precisely what I am doing under the circumstances.

Mr. JAVITS. So we will just have to depend on the matter of recognition and the alertness of recognition.

Mr. HELMS. I simply wanted to make the point that I have discussed with the Senator from New Jersey and others my willingness to take my lumps if I am defeated on a vote. But I do want my amendment voted on, either by a tabling motion or an up-or-down vote, preferably the latter, but opponents of my amendment have not been willing to make such an agreement.

But if we can reach such an agreement, I say to the Senator, I am prepared to go right ahead, and save the Senate a great deal of time.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield me 1 more minute?

Mr. CASE. Yes; on the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. On the bill.

Mr. President, would the Senator yield enough time for a quorum call?

Mr. CASE. I yield for that purpose on the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, on our time, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The second assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I object

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The second assistant legislative clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1504

(Purpose: To amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 to condition the furnishing of assistance to southern Africa)

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I send to the desk an unprinted amendment under the 1-hour time limitation and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1504

On page 11, line 6, before the period insert a comma and the following: "except that none of the funds under this section may be available for the purpose of furnishing assistance to any country in southern Africa engaged in a civil war unless such assistance is furnished to all of the contending forces in such war on the basis of the population controlled by such forces and on the basis of the needs of such population".

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a parliamentary inquiry before beginning his statement?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am happy to yield.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, it is my understanding there is an hour on this amendment, one-half hour for the sponsor, and one-half hour for the manager of the bill. Am I correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE. And that no amendment to this amendment can be offered in the way of a perfecting amendment until the expiration or yielding back of the time by both the Senator from California and the manager of the bill. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CASE. Except by unanimous consent.

I thank my colleague.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield for 10 seconds, because I have to go to another location?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I am happy to yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. THURMOND. I wish to thank the able Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Ken Fish, of the Armed Services Committee staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during the debate and votes on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. I thank the Senator again.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, this amendment is very simple on its face. It calls for even-handed distribution of funds earmarked for Southern Africa from the economic support funds in section 533. Perhaps it would be best, first of all, to read the section of the committee report dealing with this section:

Section 533 earmarks $110 million of the funds authorized under this chapter for the countries of southern Africa to address problems caused by the economic dislocation resulting from regional conflict and for education and job assistance. These funds may be used to provide humanitarian assistance to African refugees and displaced persons, to improve transportation links disrupted or jeopardized by regional conflicts, and to provide economic support to the countries in the region.

The committee adopted an amendment by Senator Clark which raised the total amount of funds earmarked under this section to $110 million. This represents a net increase of $40,909,000, as $24,091,000 had been programed for countries in southern Africa in the development assistance account. The functional development assistance accounts have been reduced by a corresponding amount because of the prohibition against providing both development assistance and security assistance to the same country.

The committee agreed on the importance of maintaining southern Africa programs at very near last year's levels in view of the mounting economic and humanitarian needs of this rapidly changing and volatile region. The possibility of internationally recognized solutions to the conflicts in Namibia and Zimbabwe require a flexible U.S. policy in the area and the availability of economic assistance to provide for a satisfactory transition to genuine independence for those countries. The congressional presentation documents identified three major uses of these funds: $20 million for balance of payments assistance for Zambia, $14 million for refugees and $11 million for the transportation sector in Botswana.

Mr. President, these words of the committee report must give us pause. For underneath the humanitarian-sounding phrases there lurks the opportunity to use these funds to favor one side or the other in the civil wars now in progress in Southern Africa. Although the general language of the bill prohibits the funds from being used for military or paramilitary activities, the same groups are engaged in political activities for which "developmental" aid can be decisive.

For example, the report specifies $20 million for Zambia, and another $14 million for refugees. Just exactly what is a refugee? Is it someone who has crossed the border, received military training, and is now awaiting assignment? Is it his wife, or his child? Does the provision of medical assistance to such "refugee" camps constitute a military activity? Or the education of children who have been forcibly kidnaped to be indoctrinated into Marxism and trained as guerrillas?

We know perfectly well that such events have taken place and are taking place. If such support were given to the camps of the Patriotic Front in Zambia, to use just one example, we would be decisively intervening on the side of avowed antidemocratic forces, seeking to impose a one-party dictatorship on Rhodesia, and against the blacks who are seeking peaceful, democratic solutions.

Now some of my colleagues might doubt that such intervention might ever happen. That might very well be the case. But look what has happened to the funds which the United States contributes to the United Nations. These funds have been used shamelessly to support the Patriotic Front, to support SWAPO, and to support other so-called "liberation movements."

Let me be specific. Between 1974 and 1978, the U.N. development program—a fund whose rationale is identical with that of the economic support fund—contributed $4,889,370 to support the Patriotic Front and similar groups in Zambia and Mozambique. The UNDP, for example, provided $261,898 for 3 years to Nkumbi College in Zambia, which reserves one-half of its capacity for national liberation movement students. It provided $404,595 for "educational assistance" to ZANU and ZAPU, the chief component of the Patriotic Front. It provided $964,000 for a school for "Zimbabwean refugees" in Lusaka, Zambia. It provided $1,684,000 for a school for Zimbabwean refugees in Mozambique. It provided $5,040 for scholarships for two Patriotic Front students in the United States. It provided $1,570,838 for "training for middle-level manpower of Namibia and Zimbabwe"—that is for the Patriotic Front and SWAPO. The so-called training will be given by the Communist-dominated ILO.

Yet no training or assistance is being given by the U.N. to black moderates such as Bisoph Muzorewa's UNAC.

Moreover, there is more of this sort of thing planned. Right now the U.N. is talking about setting up a "Zimbaewe Institute" in Mozambique for an estimated $3 million "to train future Zimbabwean civil servants in public administration and government." Of course, such an institute in Mozambique under the present regime will have nothing but Maoist or Marxist instructors. The U.N. also wants to set up a $550,000 health center for Zimbabwean refugees in Mozambique. Is it really for civilians, or is it intended to do double duty as a military field hospital? And the $584,300 "agricultural project" for the Patriotic Front in Mozambique—is that to teach agriculture, or is it to produce food for the guerrillas?

Indeed, in addition to the projects I have just mentioned, the U.N., out of its regular budget, has appropriated $7.5 million to aid SWAPO, the Patriotic Front, the PLO, and other revolutionary movements.

Now I realize that these examples are all from the U.N., where the United States has surrendered direct control over its contributions, whereas the funds in this bill will be administered by the State Department. Yet we have only to examine the State Department's current obsession with the merits of the Patriotic Front, with Secretary Vance's announced desire to normalize relations with Angola, and with its rejoicing over the acceptance by SWAPO of a peace plan to realize that the United States cannot claim to be an "honest broker" in Africa.

There is every reason to believe that these funds will be used to strengthen the Marxist terrorist groups and to provide nonmilitary support activities for them. In Angola, for example, it is well known that the avowed Marxist dictator, Neto, controls only about half the country; the rest is controlled by pro-Western rebels who have been spurned by the West, yet fight valiantly on. Nevertheless, Secretary Vance has decided to "tilt" toward Neto. Will the ESF money go to support Neto and his Cuban mercenaries, at the expense of Holden Roberto and Savimbi? Will the "transportation assistance" go to repair the railroads that UNITA guerrillas keep destroying?

It is, of course, too much to hope for that the United States would actually aid the forces in these countries which are pro-Western and anti-Marxist. The best that we can hope for is for the ideologues in the State Department to remain neutral. If they give aid at all, they should give it evenhandedly to both sides. If they cannot give it evenhandedly, they should not give it at all.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the pleasure of the Senate? Who yields time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I would like to reserve the time in case it is necessary.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, the managers of the bill do not have any desire to debate this at length.

On the other hand, we do not want to yield back all our time until such time as the Senator from California is prepared to yield it back on his behalf. So I would ask the Senator from California if he wants to use some more time now.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I would be happy to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. CASE. The Senator is prepared to yield back the rest of his time?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Yes.

Mr. CASE. I understand that upon the conclusion of the time a perfecting amendment to this amendment may be offered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. CASE. With that understanding, I yield back the remainder of the time for the managers.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1505

(Purpose: To lift Rhodesian sanctions following free elections of a new government)

Mr. CASE. I offer a perfecting amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is recognized.

Mr. HELMS. I was seeking recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He was, too.

Mr. HELMS. An effort is being made here to block a vote on my amendment, and I want this to be perfectly clear to all of the Members of the Senate and to the press gallery and all the visitors.

The Senator from North Carolina has maintained from the very beginning that all he wanted was a vote up or down or a tabling motion on his amendment, and I think we have gone to a pretty low level when we go to tactics like this.

Mr. CASE. I do not care to debate low level or high level with by beloved colleague, who speaks out of deep conviction, as do I. But there is no particular reason why we should not have the issue between him and our amendment drawn and debated in that context and voted on in confrontation. If the Senator wants now to have such a vote he can have a prior vote by offering, as I understand, his amendment as a substitute.

Mr. HELMS. I will accept the Senator's offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending which the clerk will report.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE), of himself, Mr. JAVITS, and Mr. MOYNIHAN, proposes an amendment to amendment numbered 1504, which will be unprinted amendment numbered 1505:

On page 1, line 3, strike all after the word "for" and insert "other than the purposes specified in this section."

Mr. CASE. Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

Mr. HELMS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The legislative clerk continued with his reading of the amendment as follows:

Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

"(1) by striking out the second and third sentences of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: no Executive Order which was issued under this subsection before the date of enactment of the Foreign Assistance Authorization Act, fiscal year 1979 and which applied measures against Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable before the beginning of fiscal year 1980, provided that the President of the United States determines that: (a) the Government of Rhodesia has committed itself to participate in, and negotiate in good faith, at an all-parties conference held under international auspices on all relevant issues, including the terms of majority rule and the protection of minority rights, the Anglo-American plan and the terms of the Salisbury Agreement, and (b) a Government has been installed, chosen by free elections in which all population groups have been allowed to participate freely, with observation by impartial internationally recognized observers.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there seems to be some disagreement about whether a Member is guaranteed an up-or-down vote or a tabling motion vote on his particular amendment. I know of no rule in this body that guarantees any Member, including myself, or any other Member the right to be guaranteed an up-or-down vote or a tabling motion vote on his amendment.

Each of us takes his own chances on that, as the Senator from North Carolina does. It does not seem to me proper that the Senator from North Carolina says that this is a railroad simply because he is not entitled to the first vote. The person who is entitled to the first vote is the person whose amendment is pending, and I do not see that as denying someone a vote on his amendment. Each one takes his own chance.

I would be happy to yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr BAKER. Who has control of the time on this amendment?

Mr. CASE. I understand the Senator from New Jersey, as the proponent, and the Senator from California in opposition. The Senator from New Jersey yielded to the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proponent of the amendment has control of time in favor of the amendment, and the manager of the bill has control of the time in opposition, in which case, the minority leader or his designee has control of the time of the opposition, unless he favors the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, a further parliamentary inquiry at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BAKER. At this time I gather from the sponsorship of the amendment, the managers of the bill favor the perfecting amendment. Therefore, do I have control of the time of the opposition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Chair.

I might say for the benefit of those who may be interested that at some point when it is appropriate procedure I will make a motion to table the perfecting amendment.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. President, I saw this coming, and I suggested to all parties that nobody take advantage of anybody else and that, therefore, Senator HELMS should submit his amendment and we would submit ours as a substitute, which was the way in which I thought matters were going to go after considering it yesterday. Nobody made any promises or commitments to anybody, but it was just my surmise. That would have been the orderly course.

Now, as to the opportunity for a vote, let us understand the procedure. There is adequate opportunity for a vote according to the rules of this Chamber. We have submitted a perfecting amendment to the amendment of Senator HAYAKAWA. A substitute, as I understand it, will lie to the entire amendment with the perfecting amendment in it. The vote will come on the Case-Javits-Moynihan amendment to perfect the Hayakawa substitute.

If that fails, the Hayakawa substitute will remain exactly as it is, and the Senator from North Carolina can submit a substitute to that; or if that succeeds, it is only a perfecting amendment, and his substitute will still lie and he has the vote. So in any case, he has the vote.

Finally, if I can give him parliamentary advice, you can always add to the end of the bill anything you please, and say, "Notwithstanding anything else that came before, this is what I want," and, if the Senate is with you, you have it.

So I cannot see where unfairness is charged. Somebody has to come first, that is all, and the maneuvering for position around here about who comes first does not decide the issue unless you have a majority of the Senate. We all know that. We are not children.

So, frankly, I do not see why there is any big deal about it. You will have your vote, Senator, and you should. No one can deny it to you, except that it may come after or before. In our effort, we come before. It is not such a big event, as we all know around here.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I designate the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) to control the time in opposition.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I appreciate the lesson in parliamentary procedure. Needless to say, I am fully aware of all that the distinguished Senator from New York has said. But notwithstanding that, it is quite interesting that on at least three occasions, and I think four, during the last 24 hours, I have made an offer to cut the time for debate down to 1 hour, to save the time of the Senate, if the opponents of my amendment would simply give me a vote up or down, or on a motion to table my amendment.

This perhaps indicates a certain nervousness on the part of Senators who oppose lifting the sanctions on Rhodesia. It may be that they are worried about whether they have the votes, despite the fact that the administration and the State Department have pulled out all of the stops in trying to defeat the so-called Helms amendment. There have even been telephone calls from the administration to North Carolina, seeking to promote fear among the tobacco farmers, saying, "Oh, Senator HELMS is going to hurt the tobacco industry in North Carolina if his amendment prevails." Such a suggestion is nonsense, and the tobacco people were amused that the administration would resort to such tactics.

Those are tactics which I resent, Mr. President, because what we are talking about in this matter is human rights. This is a moral question. We are talking about a situation where the United States is now in the posture of siding with the so-called Patriotic Front and against at least 80 percent of the black and white population of Rhodesia. They are pleading with us to lift these sanctions so that they can begin to pull their country together, create jobs, and start the wheels of production rolling again.

So that is what this is really all about, Mr. President. The administration apparently has been fearful that it might not have the votes to defeat the Helms amendment. Therefore there is an effort being made to move in first, so that they can perhaps pick up votes essential to defeating the Helms amendment before a vote can be conducted on the Helms amendment. The parliamentary situation is very clear.

No one is more aware of the parliamentary situation than the Senator from North Carolina. I have studied the rules as carefully as the Senator from New York. I think I know what is afoot, and I think most Senators do.

Mr. President, so that we can proceed, I am willing to yield back the remainder of my time on my side.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that?

Mr. HELMS. I certainly will, and I yield the distinguished Senator as much time as he may desire.

Mr. DANFORTH. Let me ask the Senator—I would like to speak, not at great length, but for somewhat over 15 minutes on the subject of the Case amendment as well as the subject of the Helms amendment. I wonder if the Senator will yield me such time as I may require, whether it comes from the time that is allocated on this perfecting amendment or on the forthcoming Helms amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. HELMS. I did not understand the Chair. Would he repeat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. I said you have 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. On the assumption that I will be calling up a substitute amendment, is it possible for me to yield the Senator time from the time allotted for that amendment at this time?

Mr. BAKER. Who has control of the time on the bill?

Mr. CASE. I have control of the time on this side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Missouri be accorded such time as he may require, with the understanding that I will be glad to deduct that from any time I have left on these amendments.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator reserves the right to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot hear. I wish all Senators would speak up.

Mr. CASE. If senators will try to be quiet, this is a most interesting request, it seems to me. It is based on the hypothesis that he is going to create time out of something that may or may not happen in the future.

Mr. HELMS. I will withdraw my request.

Mr. CASE. I am not against an opportunity for debate, but I am against people in opposition to this amendment having 3 or 4 hours, when we have 10 minutes left.

Mr. HELMS. I will withdraw the request. However, I am sure the Senator knows that I had nothing of the sort in mind.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield?

Mr. CASE. I do not have the floor, since the request was withdrawn, and I was speaking on a reservation to the request.

Mr. DANFORTH. All right. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield so I may direct a question to the managers of the bill?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield such time as I may have left on the amendment to the able Senator from Missouri.

Mr. DANFORTH. I have a speech about 15 or 20 minutes long. I wonder if I may have, either from the bill or from some other source, sufficient time to read my speech.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has control of the time on the bill. I would like to know how much time there is left on the bill.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CASE. After I find out the answer to my inquiry, then I will yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has 66 minutes remaining on the bill.

Mr. CASE. And how much does the chairman have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-two minutes.

Mr. CASE. Sixty-six and eighty-two?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-six and eighty-two.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I see the majority leader on the floor, and the managers on behalf of the bill on both sides of the aisle. I wonder if the most equitable solution of this is not just to create another 10 minutes on each side.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are 148 minutes left on the bill; 66 and 82, that is 148 minutes. I wonder if the Senator cannot yield the Senator from Missouri enough time to make his speech from the time on the bill.

Mr. CASE. It is not quite as simple as that, Mr. President, because there is a 4-hour operation permitted on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, if he should want to use it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I think the minority leader is right. If the managers of the bill are not in the notion to use the time on the bill, if the Senator from Missouri wants a little time I think we should accede to his request, much as I hate to do it. We should be fair and equitable to the Senator.

Mr. CASE. What is the request?

Mr. DANFORTH. For 25 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would ask unanimous consent that in addition to the 10 minutes the Senator from North Carolina has yielded to the Senator from Missouri, he gave an additional——

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Most of which is now gone.

Mr. BAKER. Most of which is now gone, that he have an additional 15 minutes, and that there be an additional 15 minutes on behalf of those in opposition.

Mr. CASE. That is understood. It is an equal situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, may I inquire how much time I have?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has 4 minutes from the time of the Senator from North Carolina, and 15 minutes that has just been yielded.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from West Virginia, the Senator from Tennessee, and the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished Senators from New Jersey and New York, I oppose it for two reasons.

First, the main legal function is to give discretionary authority to the President to lift sanctions if he determines that the Rhodesian Government has made good faith overtures to the Patriotic Front, and if he determines that a new government has been installed as a result of free elections open to all peoples. Yet the President already has such discretionary authority under law.

Under section 2 of the so-called Rhodesia resolution—that is, the repeal of the Byrd amendment on Rhodesian chrome passed last year on March 18—the President has full power to suspend the enforcement of sanctions against Rhodesia whenever he thinks that it would encourage the peaceful transfer of governing power to majority rule. The exact text says:

> Upon the enactment of this Act, the President may suspend the operation of the amendments contained in this Act if he determines that such suspension would encourage meaningful negotiations and further the peaceful transfer of governing power from minority rule to majority rule in Southern Rhodesia. Such suspension shall remain in effect for such duration as deemed necessary by the President.

Clearly, therefore, the Case-Javits amendment is superfluous. It adds nothing to the President's authority that he does not have already by specific legislation, passed only last year.

So what we are doing, therefore, is going through a rhetorical exercise. We would be putting forward a strong expression of the sentiment of the Senate, but we would be doing nothing practical to support the democratic forces in Rhodesia. Indeed, the rhetoric of the amendment is nothing more than a restatement of the present State Department position. What we would be doing is endorsing the State Department policy that has already raised so many doubts in this body.

If we examine the text, we see that it puts the internal agreement back on square one. It ignores the progress that has been made so far. It even puts the so-called Anglo-American plan back on the table for discussion.

Mr. President, is this body really aware of what the Anglo-American plan is? It is nothing else than colonialism in its most brutal and inane form. It calls for an appointed British High Commissioner who would have the powers of a dictator. He would be responsible to no one in Rhodesia, white or black. He would write the constitution, and impose it upon everyone, white or black. There would be no guarantees for the white citizens at all, except that one-sixth of the parliament would be elected by the black parliament to represent the whites. White Rhodesians would have no say in the political process. Moreover, the security forces would be made up principally of the Cuban-trained guerrillas from Nkomo's armies—men of notoriously poor discipline who have already engaged in premeditated acts of terrorism against innocent civilians.

This is what the Case-Javits amendment would put back on the table for discussion. In my opinion, the internal agreement ought to be accepted as a given fact, and methods found to induce the Patriotic Front to compromise.

The second objection to the Case-Javits amendment is that it offers little hope to the democratic forces. Everything in the amendment depends upon a Presidential determination. We all know that such determinations mean, in fact, the determinations of the State Department and the National Security Council. Neither the white Rhodesians nor the moderate black nationalists can place much hope in such determinations. There has been a lot of talk about the United States being the "honest broker" in this problem. But an honest broker does not go back on his word. We promised the Rhodesians that if they accepted the Kissinger plan and reached an agreement based on transition to democratic majority rule that we would lift sanctions during the transition. But now we say that they have not done enough.

What reason do the Rhodesians have to expect that the determination to lift sanctions actually will be made? None whatsoever, Mr. President. In the opinion of the leaders of the majority of all Rhodesians, black and white, the conditions called for in the amendment have already been met. An all-party conference was called, open to all. An agreement was reached. The Patriotic Front is still invited to participate in elections, invited even to have cabinet posts in the transitional government. Free elections open to all are planned. International observers are welcome. What more can the President be waiting for?

The Rhodesians are not being unreasonable in their belief that the United States is deliberately favoring the parties which wish to impose a one-party totalitarian dictatorship.

If the President can be expected to make the determination required, he could be expected to make it right now. He could suspend sanctions right now. He has the authority. He does not need this amendment. But his actions to date give hope to no one that he will actually make the required determination, no matter what the facts are in reality.

That is why sanctions need to be lifted immediately, with clear certainty. I believe that the President has been poorly advised in this matter. I believe that if the Senate legislates a change, it will break the logjam in our African policy, and help restore peace and order in Africa. I fully trust the President's discretion after December 31. But by then a new government, selected by majority rule, will be in place, and the situation ought to be considerably different than it is now.

The Rhodesians must have a date certain if there is to be hope, if there is to be change. Even the Patriotic Front must be confronted with a date as an accomplished fact. When they see that the United States has dropped its bias toward them, they will come to the conference table to which they have been invited.

I therefore will vote against the Case-Javits amendment.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the immediate issue before us is whether to lift economic sanctions against Rhodesia. The more fundamental issue is one of principle. What does the United States stand for in the community of nations, and how do we exhibit that stance in specific foreign policy decisions?

America stands for majority rule. It also stands for the protection of minority rights. For this reason, I supported repeal of the Byrd amendment a year ago last March. It seemed to me important at that time to give our national principles concrete form—to leave no doubt that our country would never support the repressive and racist minority government in Rhodesia.

Since March of 1977 when we voted to repeal the Byrd amendment, remarkable events have occurred in Rhodesia. Prime Minister Smith has joined with the leaders of an estimated 80 percent of the black population to form an interim government. Free elections have been promised in which even the guerrillas have been invited to participate. A new constitution will be written. The white minority, instead of being driven from the country will be encouraged to stay. They will be given a role in the government and will be assured the right to own property. Majority rule, minority rights, the orderly transfer of power, and the internal resolution of disputes are being advanced in Rhodesia.

These are basic values. They are values America stands for. The question before us is whether to continue economic pressure in light of these new circumstances in Rhodesia.

It is said that the administration's policies are neutral as between the leaders of the interim government and the Patriotic Front. That statement is simply not true. Economic sanctions are not a neutral policy. Economic sanctions are used to punish an existing regime, to bring a change in leadership or policy, to damage the economy of another country.

The guerrilla leaders suffer no harm from the continuation of sanctions. They have shown little concern for the economy and people of Rhodesia. Only those seeking a peaceful transition to majority rule are damaged, because sanctions undermine the economic and legal support of their government. Sanctions, in this case, therefore, only favor the forces of violence rather than those of moderation.

The administration is not being venal in persisting in sanctions. It is only being what it believes to be practical. Its reason for opposing the internal settlement is its belief that adverse consequences would follow if we were to support the internal settlement. It argues that if we do not take it upon ourselves to create a role for the Patriotic Front, the guerrillas will continue the bloodshed. We are told that the Russians and the Cubans might get involved. We are told that we would lose our standing with the so-called frontline states if we were to support the internal settlement.

Mr. President, my point is very simple. These practical arguments, however serious, are no justification for abandoning our principles. They are no justification for failing to stand for our beliefs. They are no reason at all why America should stop being itself.

The administration believes that the guerrillas must be accommodated because they "have the guns." That the Patriotic Front is armed and militant is a matter of deep concern. But, surely that is no justification for us scuttling an agreement reached by leaders representing the large majority of black Rhodesians. To say that the guerrillas "have the guns" does not give license to the United States of America to use its economic muscle for the purpose of wrecking the internal settlement and transferring power from a white minority to an armed black minority.

Similarly, the presence of Russians and Cubans in Africa should be of acute concern to our country. But the threat of Russians and Cubans is no reason for America to reject the efforts of Rhodesians who are working to bring about majority rule. It is not consistent with our role as a great country and a champion of human rights for America to exert pressure against the transitional government out of fear that if we do not thwart the internal settlement the Soviets and the Cubans might become involved.

Nor is the state of our popularity with Mozambique or Zambia or Tanzania a suitable justification for our opposition to the internal settlement. If principles are to guide our foreign policy, they must be our own principles, not policies fashioned for us by some other country. We cannot delegate to any other nation responsibility for the formation of our set of values nor can we doctor those values once established for the benefit of others or for the sake of our own popularity.

There are many countries in the world that do not share our system of values. There are many countries that do not believe in majority rule or in the protection of minority rights. Undoubtedly, if we were to lower our own standards, we might gain supporters in many corners of the world. But, then, we would abandon our principles. We would betray our own heritage.

The fact is that Mozambique does not share our values; nor does Zambia; nor does Tanzania; nor does Angola. They would welcome our support for the guerrillas. They would feel quite at home with the position that a minority which has the guns should dominate Rhodesia. But the opinion of these third parties does not justify us abandoning the majority of Rhodesians, black and white, who support the peaceful and democratic transfer of governmental power. If America is to be an effective champion of human rights, we must not bend to the wishes of those who care nothing about our values. We must stand firm in support of those values, even at times and places where they have no political support.

I do not argue that the internal settlement meets any test of perfection. It does not. But I do argue that the internal settlement is consistent with our fundamental principles and that a role for the Patriotic Front, other than through the electoral process, is inconsistent with our fundamental principles.

The internal settlement does not exclude a role for the Patriotic Front. It invites the guerrillas to participate fully in the interim government and in the coming election. But this is not sufficient for the guerrillas. It is not enough for them to take their chances with the democratic process. What they seek is absolute control of Rhodesia through control of the police and military forces, and this they cannot attain by free elections.

The guerrilla leaders whom our administration would impose on Rhodesia have rejected the internal settlement for obvious reasons. The Patriotic Front is supported by only a small minority of black Rhodesians, and it would certainly lose any election. In addition, Robert Mugabe, the Marxist guerrilla leader based in Mozambique, has rejected the concept of multiparty government as a luxury he cannot afford. Mugabe has further said that if given power he would hold the biggest trial since Nuremberg, with whites condemned for numerous supposed crimes, including what Mugabe has called "land holding."

Unlike the administration's position, the amendment offered by Senators CASE, JAVITS, and MOYNIHAN does not reject the internal settlement or brand it "illegal." In this respect, the Case amendment is substantially preferable to the policy advanced by the administration.

However, the Case amendment has two flaws which make it unacceptable to this Senator.

First, the amendment conditions American trade policy on Rhodesia's acceptance of a procedural requirement. willingness to attend an all-party conference held under international auspices. This condition raises the question of when trade restrictions are an appropriate instrument of American foreign policy. When is their use justified, and when does their use amount to meddling in the internal affairs of another country?

(Mrs. HUMPHREY assumed the chair.)

Mr. DANFORTH. Assuming that trade sanctions do cause damage to other countries, under what circumstances should the United States attempt to cause such damage?

The problem with the Case amendment is that it conditions lifting sanctions against Rhodesia on that country's agreement to a procedural approach advocated by the United States. Perhaps, under some circumstances, trade embargoes may be justified where matters of great substance are at issue.

An example is when another country poses a military threat to the United States, or where human rights are involved, sanctions may be in order.

But the Case amendment goes further than that. It conditions the lifting of the sanctions not only on the movement to majority rule, but on Rhodesia's willingness to: First, attend an all-party conference, and second, discuss the Anglo-American plan. This means that the United States is telling Rhodesia it must not only adopt our values, but it must be willing to attend a specific conference suggested by the United States and discuss a specific plan suggested by the United States, a plan which really means the end of the internal settlement.

Therefore, the questions raised by the Case amendment are two: Should the United States try to use economic sanctions to break the government of another country for refusing to attend a specific conference? Should the United States try to use economic sanctions to break the government of another country for refusal to discuss a specific plan we suggest to it? My answer to these questions is no. If there are to be any limitations on America's involvement in the internal affairs of other countries, surely we should be willing to stand aside when matters of procedure are at issue.

My second concern with the Case amendment concerns timing. The amendment provides that sanctions may be lifted only after elections are held. There is a certain appeal to this provision since the purpose of the sanctions in the first place was to achieve majority rule.

However, if the lifting of the sanctions will come only after elections are held. the United States will have provided an enormous incentive for the guerrillas to intensify their efforts to disrupt the elections. The Case amendment amounts to notice to the Patriotic Front that elections are the key to the economic future of Rhodesia, and therefore to the stability of any Rhodesian Government.

Moreover, I do not understand the purpose to be served by inflicting economic injury on Rhodesia during the transitional period prior to the coming elections. It would seem to me that during the time of transition to majority rule, the interim government, already under pressure from the guerrillas, deserves to be supported and not penalized by the United States.

There should be no misunderstanding. We do not propose lifting sanctions for the benefit of Ian Smith. We abhor the policies he has represented in the past. We propose lifting sanctions to show our support for the 6 million black Rhodesians whose leaders are now participating for the first time in their own government.

Madam President, last week the leader of some 70 percent of Rhodesian blacks, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, visited me in my office. He visited me to urge my support for the Helms amendment. He urged America, in his words, to "give democracy a chance" in Rhodesia. I was honored by the Bishop's presence. But in retrospect, how wrong that visit seems.

How wrong it seems for a proud leader of his people to have to travel half way around the world to entreat our support of majority rule. How wrong it seems that he should feel compelled to walk the corridors of our Capitol, to visit our Senators in their offices to plead for the future of his country. How extraordinary it seems for him to come to this country to ask us not to hurt the cause of democracy in Rhodesia.

Madam President, are there no limits to our interjecting ourselves into the affairs of other countries? Must we endlessly demand that they do things on our terms and in our way? Are we so anxious to convene conferences, and to engineer compromises, and to placate the implacable that we stand for nothing at all? Have we become so complex in our machinations, so convoluted in our reasoning, that basic values are ignored and dreams of democracy become nightmares of guerrilla warfare and economic sanctions?

Madam President, the fundamental issue is one of principle. It is not the number of guns the guerrillas have. It is not our anxiety over the Russians and the Cubans. It is not our popularity with Mozambique and Zambia and Tanzania.

In a distant corner of the world, a small country is struggling on a pilgrimage from repression to democracy. It asks our support in this effort. It asks us to stand for democracy—not for conferences, not for a role for guerrillas, not for popularity with front line states—to stand for democracy. That is a very basic value—there is nothing complicated about it. That is the issue before us today.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. TOWER. I want to commend the distinguished Senator from Missouri for a splendid statement. It was a very closely reasoned statement, a very temperate statement, one that I think should be recommended to all Members of this body to pay close attention to. I think it is one of the best analyses of the situation that I have heard and certainly puts forth one of the strongest arguments, I think a really irrefutable argument, for the rejection of the Case amendment and the ultimate adoption of the Helms amendment. I want to express my thanks and my congratulations to the Senator.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank my distinguished colleague.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I too, commend my colleague from Missouri for his statement and his position in this matter. I know it is a position he has not reached without great concern and careful examination. I commend him for an excellent presentation and, I believe, for making the right judgment on this issue.

Mr. DANFORTH. I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. BAKER. Madam President, I support the Helms amendment which will suspend temporarily the U.S. participation in the economic sanctions imposed on Rhodesia. I commend the Senator from North Carolina for his persistent pursuit of this objection in bringing, for a second time, this issue before the Senate.

I have not reached this decision to support this amendment lightly, knowing full well the implications of removing, however temporarily, our compliance with the sanctions imposed by the United Nations and agreed to by the United States. Although I long have felt that the sanctions were a reflection of a hypocritical, double standard and an ineffective means to achieve a desirable goal, I supported last year the repeal of the Byrd amendment. I did so in the belief that the Smith government had waited too long and that the time available for any hope of a peaceful transition to majority rule was rapidly evaporating.

Since that vote and the full compliance of the United States with the sanctions, the economy of Rhodesia has significantly deteriorated. Possibly as a result of that, possibly as a result of his realization that the inevitable alternative to a peaceful transition was a tragic and bloody escalation to war, extending possibly throughout southern Africa, the Smith government reached an interim agreement with the moderate black leaders. He reached this agreement with those who had the courage to return and negotiate. Many did not; although invited to participate, a significant element of Rhodesia's black population and two principal nationalist leaders decided not to participate, choosing instead a transition to an uncertain government by the force of arms.

I believe that we should give this settlement a chance to work. Although I am under no illusion that lifting the economic sanctions guarantees the life or success of the transitional government and ultimately majority rule, I believe this is the course most likely to encourage that result. Moreover, I would be more sympathetic to those who oppose our failure temporarily to comply with U.N. sanctions if those who would impose their own rule on Rhodesia were not being equipped, trained, and supported by the Soviet Union. I find it difficult to worry about the moralistic criticisms of some when weighed against the carnage made possible, if not inevitable, by Soviet arms.

Finally, Mr. President, I would argue against the thoughtful but ill-advised compromise amendment which would lift the sanctions only in the event that the elections and the transition to majority rule actually occur. However, well intended, I believe that course will only provide the Patriotic Front that much more incentive to insure that the elections do not occur and that the interim agreement collapses in chaos.

I am hopeful that given this signal of encouragement those participating in the interim settlement can encourage others to join them. I see no reason why the United States cannot continue to encourage broader participation and solicit support for broader participation from the Front Line states.

No one, least of all the black population of Rhodesia, has anything to gain by continued violence. I ask earnestly for the support of my colleagues for this amendment.

Mr. CASE. Madam President, may I ask how the time stands?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey has 28 minutes remaining.

Mr. CASE. And the Senator from Missouri?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. CASE. I thank the Chair.

Mr. CRANSTON. Will the Senator yield to me at this point?

Mr. CASE. I am happy to yield to the Senator from California.

U.S. POLICY TOWARD RHODESIA

Mr. CRANSTON. Madam President, the amendments offered today to lift the sanctions against Rhodesia have raised serious and important questions about U.S. policy in southern Africa. This is an area in which the United States is presently involved in critical negotiations in both Rhodesia and Namibia. Actions taken here today will have a profound impact on these talks, so we must weigh our decisions very carefully.

I think we all agree that it is in the interest of the United States to promote a peaceful transition to majority rule in Rhodesia. This action is consistent with our own principles of democratic government and human rights. It is in our interest to promote peace in the world. And it is in our interest to prevent an escalation of the conflict in Rhodesia into a full-scale civil war that could be exploited easily by the Soviets and Cubans, whose presence in Africa is already of such deep concern to all of us.

This administration is to be commended for its efforts to achieve a peaceful settlement of this conflict. Notable gains have been made. All parties have agreed to the principles of independence, majority rule, and universal suffrage. However, there are still important points that remain unresolved. And it will require further negotiations to find an acceptable compromise.

I do not think anyone here is under the illusion that a successful outcome can be guaranteed by these negotiations or that they will be easy. I do believe that further talks are the only hope for a peaceful transition. Without this hope, the chances increase exponentially that a violent, bloody conflict will ensue in which many innocent victims, both black and white, will die.

The United States is continuing to look for a peaceful resolution. With the United Kingdom, it has proposed an all-parties conference to bring together the Patriotic Front and the transitional government in an attempt to resolve their differences.

The U.S. role in these talks is critical. It is seen as an honest broker. This is a position of trust that has only been gained slowly and through a great deal of effort. The sanctions imposed by the Senate last year served to underscore the seriousness of our intent and bolstered substantially our credibility. To be effective, the United States must preserve its neutral image. Otherwise, there will be little chance of success for these negotiations, making war the likely alternative—the probable alternative.

The issue before us today is whether any of these amendments to lift sanctions against Rhodesia will promote the interest of peace and assist in finding a workable solution.

I support the Case-Javits amendment because I feel that it does assist our efforts in finding a peaceful answer. It clearly states that U.S. interest is in free, open election in which all parties are given the opportunity to participate. On the other hand, I believe that the Helms amendment will damage the gains we have made. Passage of the Helms amendment will encourage the transitional government's intransigence and discourage further negotiations. The Case-Javits amendment corrects any misperception that our Government favors one faction over another. The Helms amendment puts us firmly on the side of the transitional government, destroying our carefully-nurtured position as a neutral and effective mediator. The Case-Javits measure allows the President the necessary flexibility to pursue the policy of encouraging a peaceful resolution. The Helms amendment locks the President into the position of supporting the transitional government and thus could convince the Patriotic Front that war is its only alternative.

Madam President, negotiations to achieve a peaceful transition to majority rule have been long and, at times, frustrating. It is an issue which we all want resolved as quickly and peacefully as possible. But as in any situation that is as complex and demanding as this one, we must not in our eagerness to resolve the problem, destroy all the achievements we have gained thus far. The Case-Javits amendment is a tempered, well considered one, and as such I urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. CLARK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Madam President, I yield myself 15 minutes on the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is recognized.

Mr. CLARK. Madam President, I strongly oppose the Helms amendment, as it has been printed. And it would seem that the Helms amendment is the alternative to the pending Case-Javits amendment, if I understand the situation correctly. The lifting of economic sanctions would be a grave mistake. But, before I explain why, I would like to point out to my colleagues that the Helms amendment goes far beyond Rhodesia itself. Among other things, it calls for the suspension of subsection (B) of section 5 of the U.N. Participation Act. This deals with the President's ability to prosecute any person who violates any sanctions regulation issued in compliance with the Security Council. This goes to the very essence of our institutional relationship with the U.N. It vitiates the statutory mechanism that has been established by the United States to carry out sanctions it is called upon to implement. For example, it could prevent the United States from prosecuting offenders who violate the arms embargo against South Africa. (This interpretation has been checked with two legal authorities.)

If this is not bad enough, the Helms amendment would create very serious problems for U.S. policy in Africa as a whole. It would jeopardize very delicate negotiations dealing not only with Rhodesia but with Namibia as well, and it would represent a great setback for U.S. influence in the Third World.

Madam President, much of the Nation's attention has focused in recent weeks on the difficulties of reaching a negotiated settlement in the Middle East and on the frustrations of promoting human rights in the Soviet Union, and appropriately so. Yet the problems of Africa are at least as difficult and every bit as serious. Very little mention is made of the human rights violations in Africa where, in Rhodesia alone, hundreds of blacks have been killed or executed in secret, scarcely noticed by the rest of the world.

However, we now stand on the threshold of turning around the course of events in southern Africa. An agreement has been reached on Namibia, but it requires the continued support of Africa, and of the U.N., to make it work.

As Secretary Vance pointed out in his televised interview last Sunday, the lifting of Rhodesian sanctions would seriously affect the Namibian talks, at a particularly sensitive moment—before the matter was even brought to the United Nations. If we succeed, we would be removing one of the flashpoints which could spark a race war in southern Africa.

Negotiations on Rhodesia have not yet reached the same stage. Indeed, the parties are not even talking to one another. But we have good reason to believe that the internal leaders—and indeed, even South Africa—see the need for a broader-based government. Ian Smith announced just a few days ago that the internal agreement cannot possibly work without a cease-fire. I see nothing in the Helms amendment that would assure or even encourage a cease-fire, and he criticized the black members of the internal government for failing to achieve this goal—the one thing he said he expected of them.

The lifting of sanctions will not bring about a cease-fire. Indeed, it will probably make one virtually impossible to attain because it will harden both sides. On the one hand, the internal leaders will gain a false sense of security, thinking that because we lift sanctions, we may, in the last analysis, go further—perhaps even, as many whites hope—come in and militarily defend them. That is the only thing that will save them at this moment, if they fail to negotiate.

I do not think that the American people want the United States to get involved in another overseas war. I do not think that the American people want us to back a government representing white minority rule. I do not think that the American people want us to get directly involved in a conflict in which our only ally would be South Africa. And to encourage the whites to think otherwise would be cruel and irresponsible.

On the other side, the patriotic front and the front line states would conclude, if the United States lifts sanctions, that we have chosen sides. How can we possibly maintain our neutrality, how can we possibly be the kind of honest broker we were during the Namibian talks, if we go against world opinion and lift sanctions? The answer is, we cannot.

I fail to see the reasoning behind Senator HELMS' amendment. If the internal leaders deserve support, if they are genuine in saying they will hold elections, if they really have the loyalty of the guerrillas that they claim, then let them show it. If—by December 31 this year—they do all that they say they can do, then we can support them. That is only 5 months away. We in this country do not need to rush to judgment and that is precisely what we would be doing today if we vote to lift sanctions.

We would be saying, in effect, we do not care if you negotiate or not; we will support you before you even do these things. And we would be telling the whole world that we are scrapping our own Anglo-American plan, we are cancelling any hope of reaching a peaceful settlement, and we are unilaterally lifting an embargo voted by the United States. We would also be telling Great Britain, the legally constituted authority in Rhodesia, that we are abandoning her in this matter.

Great Britain held out for 13 years, even though her stakes in the country are far greater than our own. Compare her record with ours. We violated the U.N. embargo until March 1977. Nearly 1½ years later, we are seriously debating whether we should bail out now, 5 months before the internal solution set its own date for completion of the goals of independence, elections, and majority rule.

That is why I think the Case-Javits-Moynihan amendment is a reasonable compromise. We ought to at least encourage elections and negotiations.

Let there be no mistake about what we would be supporting, if we lifted sanctions. The internal leaders say they represent democracy. I fail to see where either side in this conflict has demonstrated a commitment to democracy. The internal settlement gives each white about 10 times the weight of each black vote. There is no majority presently governing Rhodesia. Ian Smith is still prime minister. The white parliament is still functioning and must approve of any change, including the new constitution. The black members of the internal government have been unable to control the conduct of the war, even though they have complained bitterly about the mass killing of civilians.

The black ministers acting as coministers with the whites are also powerless. When one black minister of justice suggested publicly that more blacks should be recruited at higher levels, he was fired—simply for the suggestion. Is that majority rule? Is that democracy?

I am not saying that the patriotic front would necessarily be any better. I am saying that it is not for us to preempt the decision of those who would properly decide who is to lead an independent Zimbabwe. The people of that country have not had the opportunity to decide for themselves. There is no objective evidence of national support for the internal agreement because there has not been any election and the guerrillas have certainly not been attracted to the plan. Each side claims it is the real representative of the masses. Let them put it to a test through neutral elections, as called for by the Anglo-American plan. It has been agreed to in Namibia. Why should it be any different in Rhodesia? If South Africa accepted such a plan for its territory, why then should such a plan not be implemented in Rhodesia?

All of Africa is watching what we do here today. And although the continent is divided by many issues, there is one they agreed upon: The lifting of Rhodesian sanctions would be a serious mistake. The 34 nations attending the OAU summit in Kartoum last week warned that this would be regarded as "an unfriendly act" and "a particular affront to the dignity and aspirations" of the African people.

The 34 nations took such a position. On that they are unified. It would, in one stroke, wreck what this administration has done through careful, patient diplomacy. It would alienate Nigeria, our second largest overseas oil supplier. It would choke the brief breathing spell we have had with Angola in recent weeks—the beginning of a period which has already produced concrete results. I am referring not only to the Namibian accord, but to the disarming of the Katangan gendarmes who attacked Zaire, and the emergence of a reconciliation between those countries.

Most important, however, the lifting of sanctions would overturn a general drift toward the West in recent times. Despite the presence of large numbers of Cuban troops in 2 of the continent's 50 countries, there has been a consistent moving away from the Soviet bloc. The U.S.S.R. has been expelled from Egypt, Sudan, and Somalia. She has suffered setbacks in Nigeria, Ghana, Mali, Guinea, and Congo (Brazzaville). She has been stymied in her efforts to gain bases in Mozambique, and to gain a strong foothold in Zambia.

However, Moscow would be delighted to see the United States lift Rhodesian sanctions. Nothing could be better from the Soviet point of view. This would have the effect of smearing the name of the United States in Africa, undoing all that has been done to show that this country is as interested in black freedom as in white. The lifting of economic sanctions would play straight into the hands of the Soviet Union.

On the grounds of sheer self-interest, on the grounds of opposing Soviet efforts to gain influence in Africa, on the grounds of human rights and freedom, I urge my colleagues not to support the alternative to this amendment, the Helms, to lift sanctions against Rhodesia in defiance of world opinion, to remove the President's authority to prosecute anyone who violates any sanctions imposed in compliance with Security Council resolutions, and which would place the United States once again, in violation of our treaty obligations under the U.N. Participation Act.

I mentioned earlier the position of the Organization of African Unity which is identical to that of the Commonwealth. All 36 Commonwealth members expressed themselves last month as being solidly opposed to the internal settlement.

In their statement they reaffirmed that "the United Nations sanctions policy should remain in force and be rigidly applied until an acceptable agreement has been achieved." In addition, the British Conservative Party also continues to support sanctions against Rhodesia. John Davies, the shadow foreign secretary, after visiting Rhodesia recently, made a statement on this subject. In a letter issued by his office, Mr. Davies said:

> The problem of sanctions is a severe one. They are undoubtedly harming the country and reducing its ability to de-escalate the level of violence. Their removal at this stage would, however, in my judgment, inhibit any prospect of a reconciliation between the conflicting parties. Moreover, it could only serve at the present juncture to increase the level of terrorism, to make more difficult the prospect of an election and to accentuate divisions within the country and outside it.

Worldwide opposition to the lifting of sanctions, then, is evident. It cuts across ideological, national, and racial lines.

Finally, Madam President, I want to emphasize the damage this vote could have on negotiations. I am reliably informed that the chances of holding a conference could be as close as a month or 6 weeks away. We must not extinguish the small candle of hope at the end of a very long tunnel of war. We must hold firm and press hard to make all sides negotiate. If negotiations fail, due to no fault of the internal leaders, and their internal agreement is implemented, then we can still lend our support at the appropriate time. But to lift sanctions now would be politically irresponsible and morally indefensible. As the New York Times stated succinctly in its editorial of July 24th, > Americans * * * do not like standing by while a cruel war escalates. If reason is to fail in Rhodesia, as it may well have failed already, let it at least be clear that the United States tried to do right. Having brought his country to this tragic pass, Mr. Smith has no claim on American policy or sympathy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CLARK. I yield myself 5 additional minutes from the bill.

Mr. President, I am opposed, as I have said, to the lifting of sanctions on Rhodesia. Frankly, I would prefer to have no amendment at all, even with conditions. My view is that the U.S. role is one of an honest broker, as it has been in Namibia, and we should press for a negotiated settlement. If we lift sanctions, we should do so through the United Nations, the original authority from which sanctions were levied in the first place.

However, I recognize the mood of the Senate, and I feel that the Case-Javits amendment is a genuine attempt to steer a middle course. As a result, I am prepared to go along with it and vote for it, albeit reluctantly.

The Case-Javits amendment conditions the lifting of sanctions on negotiations and elections. It does not deprive the executive branch of its authority over foreign policy, since it provides for a Presidential determination to certify that the conditions have been fulfilled. At the same time, however, it does require the President to lift sanctions when first, negotiations are held and the internal leaders participate in them in good faith, and second, when free elections are held with impartial international observers. This is a reasonable and fair compromise between the Helms position, which would lift sanctions immediately, and the administration's position, which is totally opposed to any legislative lifting of sanctions.

Other points need to be clarified in this amendment. First, it does not require the internal leaders to repudiate what they have already done. What we are saying is that the Rhodesian Government need do no more than what South Africa did in Namibia—namely, to continue to pursue an internal solution if they want, but to negotiate with the external leaders at the same time. They have nothing to lose at all by following this course. If the negotiations fail, they are still free to conduct their own elections, and if it is determined by impartial international observers that these were free elections in which all population groups were allowed to participate freely, then we may lift sanctions.

Second, it must be stressed that if an all-parties conference is held, the internal leaders must participate in it and must negotiate in good faith. They cannot simply state that they are willing to attend. They must participate in the conference and, as much as can be determined, they must demonstrate that they are negotiating in good faith. All relevant issues may be discussed, including the terms of majority rule as laid down in both the Salisbury agreement and the Anglo-American plan.

Third, elections must be held. Now, this would preferably occur with all parties participating and the arrangements for conducting the elections should be worked out by the Rhodesian parties at the all parties conference. But if the conference does not produce results, the internal government may conduct elections on their own. However, for sanctions to be lifted, impartial international observers—whether they be from the UN (the most likely source), the OAU, the International Commission of Jurists, or any other representatives designated by the President as impartial—must be present. This is mandatory. Sanctions cannot be lifted without elections that are conducted with these observers. How else can the President determine whether the elections are free? The only way to legitimize the elections, if they are held by one side only, is to have these impartial international observers.

These are the primary requirements of lifting sanctions. I must admit that I would prefer that we be more even handed. This amendment does favor the internal leaders. There is no question about it. Nothing is required from the external leaders. I fear that it may be misinterpreted by Africans and it may even possibly harden the positions of both sides. For these reasons, I would prefer not to have it. However, I do favor negotiations, and this amendment offers an incentive to the internal leaders to go to the conference table. I hope that the African leaders note this point well. Also, I have always stated that elections are necessary. The leaders of the Patriotic Front have been in disagreement on this point at various times, as have the front line states—in disagreement as to the necessity of holding elections, and the arrangements for holding them, and the timing. I have always said, however, that I believe that elections are the only way to settle the matter of who ultimately leads an independent Zimbabwe. These two points—negotiations and elections—are tied to the lifting of sanctions and therefore I support it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, by authority of Senator CASE, I yield myself 10 minutes in respect to this particular amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) may proceed.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think it has been very useful and very interesting to have had the really fine presentations of our colleague, Senator DANFORTH, who is one of our rising young stars, and of our colleagues Senator CRANSTON and Senator CLARK, I think these presentations pose the issue very well for this reason.

The question is, Shall we be polarized on Rhodesia policy or shall we try to find a moderate, middle course?

Senator CASE and I are suggesting to the Senate a moderate, middle course.

The polarization occurs on position of the two sides. On the one hand, we have Senator DANFORTH's argument: "Go ahead right now, lift the sanctions and, in essence, recognize and accept the internal settlement which has now been made." On the other hand, Senator CLARK has said most vividly, and he is certainly identified strongly with his position: "Frankly, I would prefer to have no amendment at all." But, if an amendment has to be, because of the realistic situation in the Senate, then he would certainly rather have ours than have the Helms amendment. So even though the Helms amendment has not yet been presented—we know it will be—he chooses ours but prefers nothing, which is the present administration policy. The Case-Javits amendment is not an endorsement of current administration policy as we perceive it, but a "corrective amendment" to it.

Mr. President, my position, and I think that is also the position of Senator CASE, is that we first determine a policy and then write an amendment to suit that policy.

I do not agree with the Helms policy of lifting the sanctions, and I do not agree with the Clark policy of leaving the sanctions on until the United Nations takes them off. I believe that we should adopt a course which will aid the coming of democracy and of peace to Rhodesia. I am very encouraged by the fact, that this technique has worked in respect of Southwest Africa or Namibia which was just as sticky a problem, lasting just as long, and seemingly just as insoluble, and also had the parallel of a guerrilla force. Indeed, a much more vested and longstanding guerrilla force with a pro-Communist state to harbor it, to wit, Angola. Nonetheless, the technique of bringing the parties together first and then trying for an agreement worked in that instance. We want to give it a chance in this instance, too, with all the parallels.

What I am saying is this: This is a 1-year bill. It only goes until the beginning of the fiscal year 1979, October 1, 1979. Encompassed within this period is the December 31, 1978, date upon which the internal settlement hinges. The transitional government, which is very temporary, from March to December, prepares for elections by December 31, 1978. So the whole drama must be played out within the period of time which is the period of this bill. We see the lines of possible settlement emerging. So we have written an amendment, which encourages the effort to settle the Rhodesian problem in the Namibian style. That is really what we are doing. We will promote the effort to settle the difficulty according to the way it was settled in Namibia.

How do we do that? We provide that the Government of Rhodesia, the interim government corporate in good faith to join in a conference which will include those on the outside, the so-called guerrillas, and will negotiate in good faith at an "all-parties conference" held under international auspices, on all relevant issues including the terms of the internal settlement and the Anglo-American plan.

Those issues are by no means pleasing to the guerrillas, either because they insure discussion of the interim agreement, the Salisbury agreement, but they also include the Anglo-American plan which we and the British have been advocating for a long time.

Whether the guerrillas will come or not to such a conference we, as yet, do not know, and we have no such assurance.

What we require is that the Government of Rhodesia show it is willing to negotiate in good faith at such a conference. If the guerrillas refuse to negotiate within the context of an international conference under international auspices, then the condition is excused so far as the Rhodesian transitional government is concerned.

That does not end the situation. We provide that if a conference does not take place, but if elections take place then the sanctions are lifted. We mean elections of a character which suit the policies of our country and of Britain, and generally of the free countries of the world; to wit, a government has been installed chosen by free elections in which all population groups have been allowed to participate freely, which means the blacks, with observation by impartial internationally recognized observers.

If such a government is installed and that finding is made by our President, then but only then will the sanctions be lifted.

Mr. President, I started, in the first instance, very strongly favoring this internal settlement, and I still do. But there must be performance and not just promise.

My attention is called to a debate on an amendment submitted by Senator CASE and myself last month relating to this matter. I take the liberty, and hope it will not be presumptuous, to quote myself:

> I think it takes the right attitude of sympathy and commitment for peaceful settlement.

That is, the terms of the internal settlement.

I think Senator CASE has served us all immensely in this particular area. He essentially included a finding in the bill which we were discussing last month, and I joined him in that amendment, as did Senators DOLE and BROOKE, in which generally speaking, supports the type of solution which had been made. That is, an election which would be one in which the black majority could elect and effectuate majority rule by the end of 1978, with protection of minority rights.

The black majority of Rhodesia is very sharply divided. Bishop Muzorewa and the Reverend Sithole are the most important black leaders on the side of the internal settlement. They are in the Rhodesian Government now, and, two, to wit, Mugabe and Nkomo, are out; they are the guerrillas who call themselves the "patriotic front."

I think it is fair to say that there is very unlikely to be a peaceful solution in Rhodesia unless some way is found of coping with the guerrilla menace. Either the country unites under the existing government, and there is an election, and that election gives the government legitimacy, which it does not yet have, and a unification of the country under a government which can then fight the guerrillas as enemies of the country. Or, if that is not the alternative, the guerrillas will win because you cannot stand against them in any other way. There must be a legitimate government, with or without them, and an effective resolve not to allow a settlement imposed by guns.

Therefore, to bring peace and stability it is necessary to have legitimacy. The aim of our amendment is to bring about that legitimacy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 10 minutes have expired.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield myself 10 minutes on the bill, with the permission of the Senator from New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CASE. What is the situation as to time, Mr. President?

Mr. JAVITS. We have used up the time on the amendment.

Mr. CASE. You have?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, I have used up 10 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are 12 minutes remaining on the amendment.

Mr. CASE. I yield 10 minutes on the bill.

Mr. JAVITS. We are trying to bring about a situation of legitimacy for the government so that either it is unified against the guerrillas or by the conference technique an agreement has been reached, as in Namibia, which includes the guerrillas. Both the contingencies are fully covered in our amendment. If the present Rhodesian Government says, "We are willing to negotiate in good faith everything, including the Anglo-American plan and the Salisbury agreement," and the guerrillas are willing to go to a conference on that basis, fine, then that condition is fully satisfied.

If, however, the guerrillas say, "No, we will not go to a conference, notwithstanding the agreement of the government," then, nonetheless, if elections are carried through, and there is majority rule as called for by the internal settlement, and an elected government, under the Salisbury agreement is installed in office, then the sanctions are lifted just the same, whether or not there is a conference.

Really thinking it through it is hard for me to imagine a fairer proposition. I think this is very intelligently drafted. I did not have the sole doing of it. Senator CASE has been working on this for a long time. It is fair because it takes account of all relevant contingencies. The guerrillas cannot frustrate us; the internal government cannot frustrate us. Really this is self-operative and sets out what should be the policy of the United States.

I do not know whether this is or is not the policy of the United States. I rather suspect it has not been up until now. From the declarations of the various officials of our Government including Andrew Young, the Ambassador of the United States to the United Nations, I felt a "tilt," toward the guerrillas. I would not sponsor this amendment unless I were confident—and I am—that this tilt is corrected by the amendment and that the United States is truly put in the position to be the honest mediator, the honest broker, and that its actions are conditioned upon the factors established in this amendment.

One last point: To those who would oppose us I would point out that this is the truly moderate course because we are providing for a lifting of the sanctions. This is something that the most ardent proponents of the opposite side are against. Senator CLARK has made that very clear. He believes that sanctions should only be lifted by the United Nations.

The fundamental thrust, and the reason why this is an honest compromise, is that we are adopting the proposition that the United States itself should lift the sanctions, as one of the central themes of our amendment. But, that should follow from the fulfillment of two basic conditions.

I yield.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Of course.

Mr. CHURCH. I thought I would speak separately on behalf of this amendment, but the Senator makes such a good argument I prefer just to ask a question or two to emphasize the major premise.

Is it not the case that this amendment, if adopted, would have the effect of lifting economic sanctions against Rhodesia once a legitimate government has been established in that country?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Whatever that government may be?

Mr. JAVITS. Yes, yes, yes.

Mr. CHURCH. Is it not also a fact that first, the amendment is drafted in such a way that we favor neither the existing government, which does not rest upon popular election, nor the guerrilla groups that contest that government, and second, the adoption of this amendment would in no way tilt American policy in one direction or the other but properly would leave this to the Rhodesians themselves?

Mr. JAVITS. Again the answer is flatly yes, and I will not say any more because there are no qualifications.

Mr. CHURCH. I think the case the Senator has made for the amendment cannot be embellished by any further remarks on my part. I commend him for his argument.

I think that clearly we would make a very serious mistake if we were to intervene now and lift this embargo prior to the time that the Government of Rhodesia has been legitimatized either by bona fide negotiations bringing all parties together or by elections by which the people themselves have an oportunity to select the government in Rhodesia.

I think the Senator's argument is quite persuasive and I do hope that the Senate will approve the Case-Javits proposal.

(Mr. MOYNIHAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague very much.

My argument, just to sum it up, is based on two solid propositions: First, the need for legitimatizing a government before we lift sanctions; and, second, the willingness to negotiate by the government with the guerrillas if they, too, will negotiate in good faith.

But the guerrillas have no veto. If they do not agree to negotiate, if the negotiation fails because of them, if the conference has no result, and if these internal fellows go through with their election and install a government, we will lift the sanctions.

Our good faith is shown by the fact that we are not waiting for the U.N. We will lift them upon conditions which cannot be frustrated by either party, acting in good faith. If the guerrillas come to the conference, OK. If they do not, OK, too. If there is no agreement, OK, too. So long as there is an election, even under the Salisbury agreement, and a government is installed where the black majority has voted and international observers have seen it is an honest election, off go the sanctions.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is eminently fair, eminently reasonable, intelligent policy. If our policy has not been that up to now, that is what it ought to be, and that is why I believe this amendment is a sound solution to a very, very difficult situation.

I thank my colleague for yielding me time.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I am enormously gratified by the cooperation that we have had in this effort. The Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) has given the full measure of his enormous ability. His explanation of the amendment now, and the circumstances arising in connection with its development, have been completely lucid and clear. His colleague from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN), our cosponsor, cooperated fully in this matter, and it has been a pleasure and a joy for me to be associated with them in this project.

Mr. President, I yield such time as he may desire on this amendment to the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK).

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there is an interesting announcement today out of Salisbury, stating that elections have been scheduled for December 4 to 6, with observers invited from the OAU, the U.N., and Western countries.

I think this underscores the wisdom of the Case amendment. We seem already to have pushed the Rhodesian Government closer to these goals of negotiations and elections, and we welcome this further indication of the willingness of Mr. Smith and his copartners in the Salisbury agreement to go forward with free and fair elections.

The amendment proposed by Senators CASE, JAVITS, and MOYNIHAN would give the President authority to acknowledge this development by lifting our sanctions, after determining that elections have been freely held in Rhodesia. We would hope that in the interest of peace in Rhodesia and the region, the Salisbury parties will also agree to attend a meeting of all the parties in an effort to end that conflict.

If the external parties then refuse to attend such a conference, or to engage in serious negotiations based on compromise, the onus for the continuing conflict will then be clear, as will the responsibility of our Government in lending its full support to those who are committed to peace and democracy.

I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. I have 3 minutes and the other side has none, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The other side has 9 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. I yield my time to the Senator from New Jersey.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina yields his time to the Senator from New Jersey. The Senator from New Jersey has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, do I understand, then, we have 12 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. CASE. I do not expect to take any large share of that time, myself, at all.

The statements that have been made on the floor, and the explanations, have been excellent. My job here has been largely one of working in the development of a solution, and not for the sake presenting, expounding, or orating about great issues in philosophy or policy. But I think I would like to say just a couple of things.

The Senator from North Carolina, in his amendment as it is offered now and as it was offered on an earlier occasion, is not an utterly unreasonable person. He is responding to concerns that many Americans—including many Members of the Senate, and I myself am one of them—have had about occasional twists and turns in our policy in regard to Africa. Thus, I was pretty sure that he would get enormous support for his amendment, as a protest and as a caution to the executive branch not to go too far in the direction of trying to bring all parties together and forcing the lamb to lie down with the lion for ideological purposes; and I think there was some tendency on the part of certain people in the administration to do that.

But I think on the whole the administration's purpose is probably the sound one of seeing if, by the exercise of great patience and as much skill as can be brought to bear on this difficult situation, we can get solutions which will be supported by the majority of the Africans themselves, at least of those Africans who are reasonable minded and who are not driven by hatred of white people, by hatred of democracy; even by love of communism, if you will, although that is probably not a major part, in most cases, of the motivations that are disturbing that continent.

The concern that our Government at times was yielding in a somewhat oversentimental fashion to that sort of thinking, was what gave to the Helms amendment the strength that it had.

Recognizing that, and agreeing with much of it, it still seemed to me most desirable—at the same time as we register a protest or a warning againt overindulgence in wishful thinking along the lines that some people in the administration have indulged in—that we not go so far as to take away the proper degrees of flexibility that the administration ought to have and needs to have in dealing with situations that are very difficult indeed.

And so Senator JAVITS, his colleague from New York, Senator MOYNIHAN, I, Senator CLARK, and many of us have joined together in this effort. We worked, we hammered, we changed a phrase here and a word there, we put a little more emphasis on one part compared to another, but in the end, what we want to accomplish is a clear statement that we agree with the Helms purpose, favoring majority rule, yes, protecting minority rights, yes. But we do not agree that it is necessary, in accomplishing that objective, to give up the kind of flexibility that the administration, or any administration, would need in these circumstances.

With some reluctance, I think we have got perhaps not active but tacit approval from most of the professionals in the field that we have accomplished basically that. I hope that the Senate will take that position, and I hope that it will support this amendment, it was offered not in anger, in any sense, at any of the positions taken by my friend from North Carolina or any of his colleagues or people on the other side, either, but because it seems to us to be the best solution of a very difficult situation.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 1 minute?

Mr. CASE. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I simply want to thank my friend from New Jersey for his statement. He and I do not agree entirely on this matter, but he has made a gentlemanly comment, and I want him to know I appreciate it.

Mr. CASE. I appreciate that, too; and I thank my colleague.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Tennessee. The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), and the Senator from Michigan (Mr. RIEGLE) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 57, as follows:

So Mr. CASE's amendment (UP No. 1505) was agreed to.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Anthony Mazzaschi, of Senator MCINTYRE's staff, be granted the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question occurs on the amendment of the Senator from California, as amended.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1506

(Purpose: To amend the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 with respect to Southern Rhodesia)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1506, in lieu of language proposed to be inserted by unprinted amendment numbered 1504, as amended.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

In lieu of the language proposed to be inserted by unprinted amendment no. 1504, (as amended) insert the following: "provided further that

(a) Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

(1) by striking out the second and third sentences of subsection (a) an inserting in lieu thereof the following: "In recognition of the settlement of March 3, 1978, reached by leaders representing a majority of Southern Rhodesians, no Executive order issued under this subsection and applying measures against Southern Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable through December 31, 1978."; and

(2) by striking out subsections (b) and (c).

(b) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, the amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair asks the Senator from North Carolina whether this is the amendment on which there are to be 4 hours of debate.

Mr. HELMS. That is correct. I thank the chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thanks the Senator.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HELMS. I gladly yield to my good friend.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Would the Senator be agreeable to a limit of 2½ hours, to be equally divided?

Mr. HELMS. As the majority leader and I have discussed, that will be entirely agreeable.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I would like to be protected to the extent of 20 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator yield 20 minutes to the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.)?

Mr. HELMS. I included 20 minutes for the distinguished Senator from Virginia in my agreement with the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I make that request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the time is limited to two and a half hours.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JAVITS. This amendment, as I understand it, is an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. If it is agreed to, it will eliminate what has just been voted on and will insert what Senator is moving as a substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If this amendment is adopted and then the amendment of the Senator from California, as amended, is adopted, that would be the case. The Senator is correct.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. CASE. The Senator from New York was the most appropriate man of whom to make the inquiry because it was his ingenuity, his mastery of our parliamentary procedures that made it possible for the Senator from North Carolina to continue on with his nefarious work. Is that correct?

Mr. HELMS. The Senator from North Carolina would not necessarily agree to the latter part of that statement. [Laughter.]

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HELMS. The rules protect the Senator from North Carolina in everything except the order of votes on this proposal.

Mr. JAVITS. That is right. That was the only point I made. I am pleased now that things are squared away on procedure.

Mr. HELMS. Yes. I see no problem.

Mr. JAVITS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement of July 19, the Senator from North Carolina was granted 4 hours, equally divided, on an amendment. This amendment, proposing the lifting of sanctions by the United States against Rhodesia, is that amendment, and as the distinguished occupant of the Chair knows, by unanimous consent time agreement the 4 hours have now been reduced to 2½ hours.

Mr. President, on June 28, the Senate voted 48 to 42 to table an amendment to the Foreign Policy Authorization bill which would have lifted U.S. sanctions against Rhodesia until the end of fiscal year 1980. Despite the strong showing, some maintained that the period proposed for the lifting of sanctions was too long, too open-ended with regard to the situation in Rhodesia.

The present amendment chooses as the terminal date for the lifting of sanctions December 31, 1978. Thus no executive order dealing with sanctions for Rhodesia could be enforceable from the date of enactment of this bill until December 31, 1978.

The date of December 31 was chosen because that is the date agreed upon by the leaders of Rhodesia for the proclamation of independence under a democratically elected, multiracial government. By that date, the world will know whether the internal agreement has indeed been successful.

The President of the United States will then be in a position to reappraise the U.S. attitude toward sanctions. On January 1, 1978, the executive orders imposing sanctions will automatically be enforceable once more. Under existing law, passed in 1977:

> The President may suspend the operation of the amendments contained in this Act if he determines that such suspension would encourage meaningful negotiations and further the peaceful transfer of governing power from minority rule to majority rule in Southern Rhodesia. Such suspension shall remain in effect for such duration as deemed necessary by the President.

Thus the President has full power and authority to suspend sanctions if he determines that such action will bring about the transition to majority rule desired. On the other hand, he can completely withdraw the Executive order if the situation warrants it.

Thus my amendment now pending leaves wide latitude to the President's discretion in reassessing the situation. It is true that it does establish a time certain for the initial suspension of enforcement of sanctions. But if the President were of a mind to suspend sanctions, he would have done so by now. It is perfectly obvious that he does not intend to do so. In some respects, he is doubtless trapped in his own rhetoric, and that of Secretary Vance and Ambassador Young. In suspending sanctions by congressional action, the President would be able to withdraw gracefully from an untenable policy position.

On September 24, 1976, Prime Minister Ian Smith announced at the end of his discussions with then Secretary of State Henry Kissinger that he had accepted the Kissinger proposals for transition to majority rule. These include a transitional government to consist of a Council of State with equal black and white membership, a Council of Ministers with a black majority, and the security forces under control of the Ministers of Defense and Law, who would be white Rhodesians.

These key provisions should be compared with the internal agreement reached after negotiation with the black moderate leaders, representing a majority of Rhodesians. Instead of a Council of State with equal representation, the present transition government has an Executive Council which is 4 to 1 black. Instead of a Council of Ministers with a black majority, and the army control by a white minister, the present Ministerial Council has blacks participating equally in all cabinet posts, including those controlling the army and the police. It should be fully recognized that Prime Minister Ian Smith went far beyond the requirements of the Kissinger Plan in reaching the internal agreement with the moderate black leaders.

It was only a little over a year ago that the distinguished chairman of the Africa Subcommittee, the senior Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK), spoke about the necessity for Mr. Smith to negotiate. He said:

> In retrospect, it may well be that historians will evaluate the political effect of this bill as being more meaningful now than at any other time since the Byrd amendment was enacted. It comes after the collapse of the Geneva talks and in the wake of the assertion by Prime Minister Ian Smith that he expects assistance and sympathy from the West because he accepted the so-called Kissinger Plan, although he refused to negotiate beyond it. This legislation represents, in effect, an answer to that assertion. It shows that the U.S. Congress is in accord with the statement announced by Secretary Vance in early February that Rhodesians could not count on any form of American assistance in their efforts to prevent majority rule or to enter into negotiations which exclude leaders of the nationalist movements.

Mr. President, the desire of the distinguished Senator from Iowa has now been fulfilled. As a result of the repeal of the Byrd amendment last year, and other international pressures, Prime Minister Smith did move to negotiate with the leaders of the nationalist movements. The negotiations were open to all. No one was excluded. Even today, even after the Smith government has given way to a black majority transitional government, no nationalist leader has been excluded. The only leaders not participating are those who have refused in principle to agree to a Democratic government. Both the external leaders seek to establish one-party Marxist states, with confiscation of all property and "liquidation of the present regime."

Therefore, the Senator from North Carolina cannot see how anyone can fault the present agreement. Even today, the external leaders are welcome to participate in the transitional government and in the elections for the new government, if they agree to lay aside violence and adopt democratic principles. There is a limit beyond which decent men cannot go.

The former Smith government has therefore done everything that it is supposed to do. It adopted the Kissinger plan. It negotiated on the basis of the Kissinger plan to reach an agreement at a conference open to all nationalist leaders. And now a multiracial government is already in place to prepare for free and democratic elections to be monitored by international observers.

Yesterday morning, Dr. Kissinger met with Bishop Abel Muzorewa, the most prominent among the black moderates who have participated in the internal agreement. After the meeting Dr. Kissinger made a ringing endorsement of the internal settlement and Bishop Muzorewa's efforts to work out a democratic transition. If Dr. Kissinger himself has said that the requirements of the Kissinger plan have been fulfilled by the internal agreement, who can say it is not so? The United States made a commitment to the Rhodesians, and America must keep it by lifting sanctions against the transitional government.

Let me be blunt, Mr. President. If I understand the senior Senator from Iowa and his words of a year ago, sanctions were applied against Rhodesia to compel the original Ian Smith government there to concede the principle of democratic majority rule, one person one vote.

(Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD assumed the chair.)

Mr. HELMS. The distinguished Senator from Iowa intended that the sanctions should gradually cripple the economy of Rhodesia sufficiently to put pressure on the decisionmakers to yield that principle.

For whatever reasons—and we must assume that the sanctions were a significant contributory reason, the principle of democratic majority rule has now been conceded, and a constitutional agreement has been concluded between black and white Rhodesians that will lead the country to genuine independence at the end of the year on the basis of free and open elections in which every Rhodesian over the age of 18 will be able to participate. So that this may happen in an orderly way, a transitional government has assumed office that consists of Mr. Smith and the leaders of three black political groups which between them have the support of something like 80 percent of the Rhodesian people.

As I indicated earlier, Bishop Abel Muzorewa, of the United Methodist Church, is the leader of the largest of these political groups, and the man who is likely to emerge from free elections as the first Prime Minister of Zimbabwe—which is the name by which Rhodesia will be known after independence.

Parenthetically, Mr. President, I might say that the bishop went to North Carolina this past Saturday, and I was deeply touched by a visit that he paid to an 83-year-old former missionary, a delightful lady, who now lives in a Methodist home in Asheville, N.C.

I do not think I will ever forget the scene of the bishop embracing and being embraced by this gracious lady who not only taught him to speak English but converted him to Christianity.

Here is a man of good will, a widely respected leader in his country, who has come to the United States to plead with this Senate to lift the sanctions now for his government so that jobs can be created, and so that his transitional government, in which he is such a leading participant, can begin to function effectively.

That is why the Senator from North Carolina is on his feet at this moment pleading with the Senate not to dismiss the dreams, the hopes, and wishes of 80 percent of the Rhodesian people in order to try to placate a violent external group to appease so-called front-line states whose philosophies and friendship toward the United States are certainly in question.

Those of us who have been privileged to hear the bishop have heard his eloquent plea for American recognition of the very profound political change that has taken place in his country, for acknowledgment that the purpose of sanctions has been accomplished, and for immediate relief from the burden of them, since they now serve only to impede his transitional government in its earnest pursuit of the objective of a prosperous multi-party Rhodesia having close ties with the western world.

Biship Muzorewa was once a staunch supporter of sanctions. He came to the United States in 1974 to plead for the imposition of sanctions. He has persuaded many of us that now—not later, now—is the time to lift sanctions, so that the economy of his country may begin to make the recovery that will allow the first elected black government of the new Zimbabwe to inherit a going concern, thus enabling it to get away to a confident and promising start.

After all, the lifting of sanctions was promised not as a reward for holding elections, but as a reward for establishing a transitional government leading to elections. Unless we vote to lift sanctions, we will be defaulting on that promise. It is a necessary tool for the black moderates who have staked their lives and political futures on democratic procedures. It is a tool which will help make a climate where free elections are possible. To deny that tool is to throw the weight of U.S. policy toward the supporters anti-democratic, one-party, totalitarian dictatorship. As we vote on the pending amendment, I hope Senators will bear that in mind.

There are some immediate, and I believe, compelling reasons for lifting sanctions now. An appeal has gone out to the men with the guns to lay them down and be rehabilitated into civilian life, because the purpose for which they took up arms has been accomplished. There has been some response to this appeal, and I understand it is gathering momentum, but it is a slow process, bedevilled by suspicion that it is a trap. These fears need to be removed and it would be helpful if the transitional government could be given access to resources that would enable it to set up resettlement and rehabilitation programs rather than have its available resources diverted primarily to the conduct of a war with Soviet-backed guerrillas.

I believe that there are also important political and psychological reasons why we should lift sanctions now. The Soviet-backed guerrillas represent minority political groups in Rhodesia. They have rejected participation in the recent constitutional processes because they have little expectation of winning at the ballot box, and they therefore pursue their political aspirations out of the barrel of a gun. Of course the Soviets give them unstinted support, and they will continue their armed struggle for supremacy as long as the west withholds support from Rhodesia's transitional government. We have put ourselves in the unedifying position of holding the victim down while the neighborhood muggers beat him around the head. It is not too late to give him an even chance to defend himself.

It has been said by some that the only way to keep the Soviets and the Cubans out of the Rhodesian situation, is by forcing the Patriotic Front to come into the settlement. But the only reason why the Patriotic Front has a position of power is because of the massive support which Nkomo and Mugabe are receiving from the Soviets, the Cubans, and the Chinese. If the Patriotic Front is included without a guarantee that such participation will be on a democratic basis, the Front will bring in the Soviets and the Cubans for reprisals and suppression against the democratic groups. The inclusion of the Patriotic Front under such circumstances will guarantee the establishment of a militaristic police state, and the suppression of freedom. It will also guarantee that the Soviets will have complete control of the heartland of Africa—unless the components of the Patriotic Front war against each other for the prize of ultimate control.

In theory, the inclusion of the Patriotic Front should be a desirable objective. But it is not desirable as long as the Patriotic Front rejects democratic principles and continues to receive total support from the Soviets. We merely encourage the Patriotic Front to win a battlefield victory—and recent statements made by its leadership, including some made here in the United States in recent weeks, leave little doubt that that is their intention. The leaders have indicated that they will not allow an electoral process to proceed. Quite obviously we gain nothing in these circumstances by deferring the lifting of sanctions until elections have taken place. We merely increase the risk that there will be no elections. We give an advantage to a Soviet-backed force that is neither moral nor prudent. If, on the other hand, we show early and tangible support for the constitutional agreement, I believe that we provide a powerful incentive to the Patriotic Front to take its chance at the ballot box.

In talking to Bishop Muzorewa, I have been much impressed by his concern that white Rhodsians, while yielding to majority political power, should remain in Rhodesia to make their continuing contribution to the country's prosperity. It is very necessary to preserve their confidence, and especially to do so during this period of political flux. Nothing is more likely to do so than an early indication of western support for the new political course on which they are embarked.

Thus the so-called guarantees, which are often attacked by persons with little knowledge of the situation, ought to be held up as a major benefit to the black people, rather than as some sort of a trick to perpetuate white rule. As the Bishop has pointed out many times, it is absolutely imperative to retain present standards of technology and management, if the prosperity of all the people of Rhodesia is to be maintained and increased. The Rhodesians have taken to heart the lessons of Mozambique, Angola, and Zambia, and they do not want to repeat those tragic tales of mismanagement and emotional destruction of functioning economies. The new government will be controlled by blacks and have a predominantly black legislature; but the white Rhodesians are welcome to stay, welcome to participate in the political process, and welcome to keep and develop their financial interests for the benefit of all.

Mr. President, I submit that the lifting of sanctions now is the course best calculated to protect and encourage the forces of democracy and moderation in Rhodesia, and needless to say, I do hope that the Senate will approve my amendment.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may need.

I want to make clear at the outset that I am in disagreement with the Senator from North Carolina over the nature of the so-called internal government. I do not see the sitting government in Salisbury as a democratic government, ruling by majority rule, as the Senator has indicated.

Why not? Because there has been no election. You cannot have a democratic government without there ever having been a vote. The only votes that have occurred in Rhodesia in several years are those of the very limited voting rolls which are almost exclusively white. Only 3 percent of the population of Rhodesia is white, and that means that anyone who is in office there, in terms of a legitimate government in Rhodesia as we would view its legitimacy, were put there by that white minority and a handful of black voters who are included in the voting rolls. Thus Ian Smith is Prime Minister, not out of any election other than the election of this limited voting roll. So there is no democratically constituted government in Rhodesia, unless one considers that blacks do not have any right to vote.

Yes, there has been an agreement between that government of Mr. Ian Smith on the one hand and three black leaders on the other, Bishop Muzorewa, Senator Chief Chirau, and Reverend Sithole, but that is an agreement between those four parties. It is not democratically arrived at. There have been no agreements, there have been no elections, there has been no basis upon which one could say that this is a democratic, majority ruled government. Indeed, Ian Smith remains prime minister. But who elected him prime minister, other than the white minority?

What indication is there that even the black ministers who sit together in the council and who sit in the various positions of the cabinet alongside white ministers, by this Salisbury agreement, have a voice in what is happening?

We remember when the black minister of justice was so bold as to suggest that the new government, this new government, ought in fact to recruit more blacks in government. He was immediately dismissed, summarily dismissed. Bishop Muzorewa and others objected to that. Their objections did not mean much; he was dismissed.

So to say that this government which now sits in Salisbury is a democratic government, representing majority rule, is in my judgment quite a stretch of the imagination. It may be a popular government; that is yet to be tested. I can tell you, just as one brief observer going to Rhodesia, that I happen to be under the impression that if there were free elections, Bishow Muzorewa is probably the most popular member of that government. But that is my impression. Certainly you cannot create a government in Salisbury out of my impressions or anyone else's. There is one way to know whether this internal government has majority support or democratic support, and that is to hold an election.

That is all the Case-Javits proposal does, in addition to saying "You have got to go negotiate."

Why should we lift sanctions without even having an election, and just assume that the internal government is a democratic government? What kind of basis for assumption is that? A public opinion poll? I do not think we can put a government in and say it is a democratic government because of a public opinion poll.

I can tell you that this time of year, when I was first up for election, I was behind 60 to 19. I got elected. Elections decide, not public opinion polls at some stage.

All I am saying is that this agreement between three black leaders and Ian Smith is just that; it is an agreement. There is no sanction other than their own agreement.

That is all right. I am not condemning that agreement. I am simply saying that is what it is; it is not a democratic government. There have been no elections. There have been suggestions for elections, and today the government in Salisbury has said they are going to set elections, and they have set elections for December 4th through 6th. Fine, let us have them. But why should we lift the sanctions before we have a democratic government, democratically elected, in Salisbury?

Let me talk a little bit about what I think the Helms amendment would do.

I will try to keep my remarks as brief as possible. As far as I am concerned, I will not need a great deal more time on this side, although I am sure others wish to speak as well.

First of all, if we were to adopt the Helms amendments I think it is not too much to say that it would destroy our relationship with the United Nations. I know there are people here who would not mind seeing that happen, who are opposed to the United Nations in principle. That is their privilege. But I think the majority of the people in this country and in this body have expressed themselves in favor of the United States continuing to participate and work with the United Nations.

This amendment, in my judgment, would destroy that relationship. Why? Because we would have to violate the U.N. Participation Act, in effect. We would have to say we are no longer going to participate in this process. Indeed, we would, if we adopted this amendment, go further than that. In fact, if we were to actually adopt this amendment, we would be saying that we were repealing the U.N. Participation Act and, indeed, we would not be able to even ask for sanctions on any other ground.

I think the amendment would destroy the relationship with virtually every country on the African continent.

Again, I know there are people here who say we should not have any interest in Africa; that we do not care what our relationship is with that continent; never mind that it contains 50 countries, one-third of all the countries in the world being on that continent. Some do not care that much about our relationship there.

I think it is important. If there is one thing that all of the countries of Africa, with the possible exception of South Africa, agree upon, it is not to lift these sanctions. We saw last week at the OAU meeting in Khartoum all the members voted unanimously, took the position unanimously, that they did not want to lift sanctions.

We can fly in the face of every one of those nations and say, "We do not care what you want." I do not think that is an advisable kind of policy for the United States to follow.

This amendment would seriously damage our entire relationship with the Third World, many of whom are located on the African Continent. If we are going to say that we are uninterested now in what happens in the Third World, if we are going to destroy the development of dialog between the north and the south, all right, but let us be aware of the fact that we are doing that when we take actions of this kind.

Furthermore, I should say violations of human rights in Rhodesia are of the same level as we have decried in the Soviet Union, and should decry in the Soviet Union.

We have made a number of speeches on this floor about the recent trials, and appropriately so. I wish there had been the same kind of interest and concern for the trials of people in Rhodesia because many of the people in Rhodesia who are involved in this were themselves in jail without trial, without any opportunity.

It means, it seems to me, that human rights ought to be considered in black Africa as elsewhere; that their human rights are important.

I remember very well when Steve Biko in South Africa was murdered in a prison cell, not even given an opportunity for a trial. There was very little discussion of it. It seems to me that black human rights ought to be just as important as white human rights.

I think this amendment would place a peaceful diplomatic solution of the Namibian problem in serious jeopardy. That is exactly what the Secretary of State said last Sunday on Issues and Answers.

We are very close to a successful conclusion by having the five major powers of the Security Council, the Western powers, working with Namibian people as well as the South African Government. We are now very close. Indeed, both sides have agreed to the general principles. What happens if we go ahead now and lift sanctions? I think the Secretary of State is right: We would be running a great risk that those negotiations would no longer go forward.

Why should we, when we finally put together a great program, a program arrived at through negotiations and diplomacy, now be thrown over by an amendment of this kind?

Furthermore, it will be impossible to have a peaceful negotiated settlement in Rhodesia if this amendment is passed. I suppose that is the major single point.

Does anyone seriously believe that if we lift sanctions here today, and the House of Representatives does the same, that there will be a ceasefire; that the war will end; that somehow this will resolve itself? Of course it will not. It will harden both sides. The war will continue. And, as many observers have pointed out, there is every risk that we run if that war continues that we get deeper Soviet, deeper Cuban, involvement in it. The war is not going to end as a result of these sanctions.

That is what we want. We want an agreement that will bring all the parties in, that gets the ceasefire, that ends the war, and then that has democratic elections. That is what the Anglo-American plan is all about. It does not favor one side over the other. I have no more interest in taking sides with Mr. Nkomo or Mr. Mugabe than Bishop Muzorewa or Reverend Sithole or anyone lese. That is not our business. We are not to take sides. We are to be honest brokers and bring these sides together to have free elections. It is not for us to decide which of these men or women, or which of these forces, are the most popular. It is for us to work to try to get objective, internationally observed elections, and that is what it is all about.

Mr. Smith himself last week said, "Without a ceasefire the Salisbury agreement cannot work."

What is there about this amendment that would bring a ceasefire? By what stretch of the imagination can we believe that this is what is needed for a ceasefire?

The Helms amendment would place us on the side of Ian Smith and the internal leaders. It would make it impossible for us any longer to credibly be the honest broker and to work with Great Britain to negotiate peaceful diplomatic solutions.

The passage of the Helms amendment would lift sanctions regardless of whether this announced election were even held. Sanctions would be lifted regardless of the election. There is no condition that these elections have to go forward, or that they be free elections, none whatsoever. We are killing whatever incentive there may be in the Case-Javits-Moynihan amendment to have elections.

In the amendment we have adopted we have said we are going to have an election, that we are going to attempt a negotiated settlement, and if that occurs, we are going to lift sanctions.

Why would we want to throw that away simply in favor of saying, "We will lift sanctions whatever you do, regardless of whether you want to negotiate, regardless of whether you ever hold an election, regardless of the nature of that election."

Passage of this amendment, lastly, Mr. President, would, in my judgment, play directly into the hands of the Soviet Union and Cuba. There is no one who has spoken out more clearly or more loudly against such an action than the distinguished Senator who sponsors this amendment, and I respect him for that. I do not mean to say by any means that that is the intent of the amendment. Obviously, it is not. But what is its effect? If the United States at this point lifts sanctions and we are condemned by the entire African continent for having done that, by the moderate states of Africa, like Botswana, Zambia, Nigeria, others, what position then do we have in Africa? None whatsoever. We have no influence, no effect, in Africa. It is an open field for the Soviet Union and for the Cubans. From that point on, what leverage do we have, what position do we have, in Africa?

It seems to me that it would be doing the Soviet Union and Cuba the greatest favor imaginable if we were to say we are going to lose whatever influence we have, whatever relationship we have developed.

You know that the President of the United States has worked very hard over the last year and a half with the Secretary of State and others to try to develop a closer relationship. We have had Tanzanian President Nyerere in this country; we have had President Kaunda, of Zambia, in this country; we have had leaders from Senegal, Nigeria, and many, many others. We finally established some rapport with these governments. Now, if we are to say, "No, we want to lose whatever contact and rapport we have had," it seems to me that that could have only one result. That is a tremendous advantage for our adversaries, the Soviet Union and Cuba.

I hope that my colleagues will join with me in defeating this very, very important amendment that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has offered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK. I yield for a question.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Iowa mentioned earlier in his comments that the pending amendment by the Senator from North Carolina would—again I paraphrase—fly in the face of the United Nations or be detrimental to the United Nations——

Mr. CLARK. Our relationship with the United Nations.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Would be detrimental to our relationship with the United Nations.

Does not the amendment just approved by the Senate, offered by the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from New York, do what the Senator from North Carolina seeks to do, except in a different time frame?

Mr. CLARK. I do not think it does, because it does not strike the same sections of the United Nations Participation Act. That is the point I was trying to make. Let me find the amendment.

The point I was making is that the Helms amendment actually strikes the subsection—if I could have a copy of the Helms amendment. Let me read it:

Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended by striking out the second and third sentences of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following.

What I am suggesting is that if we actually did that, we would be striking a section of the U.N. Participation Act which makes it impossible for us to even ask for imposition of sanctions on any other issue.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It is correct, is it not, that the Case-Javits amendment lifts the embargo on trade with Rhodesia?

Mr. CLARK. It would lift the embargo on trade with Rhodesia if the President found that certain conditions were met.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. So by congressional act, it would lift the embargo regardless of the attitude of the U.N.

Mr. CLARK. I think the President would make that decision and would participate in that. It would not—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong on this, but I think it would not be by congressional action. I think it would be by Presidential decision.

In other words, the Case amendment says——

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I note the able Senator from New York is on his feet. I happened to jot down a statement he made on the previous amendment. He said: "We are providing for the lifting of the sanctions."

The Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) put an inquiry to the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS). He said, "Is it not, in fact, the case that the pending amendment would lift the embargo on trade with Rhodesia?"

The Senator from New York answered, "Yes, yes, yes."

Mr. CLARK. I think the Senator is correct, but it would be by Presidential determination.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I do yield.

Mr. JAVITS. To Senator BYRD, I say, the measure provides for lifting of the sanctions, but it lifts them upon two conditions. One condition is that the Government of Rhodesia has committed itself to negotiate in good faith; second, that there has been an election. A finding of fact as to whether those two conditions have been met is made by the President. When the President finds those two conditions to have been met, the sanctions are automatically lifted.

Therefore, the answer to the question whether this amendment lifts the sanctions is "yes." That is why I said what I did.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is correct. I thank the Senator from New York and that is——

Mr. JAVITS. That is right. We do not have to wait for the U.N. That is clear. We do not even wait for the President to speak. All he has to do is find that these two conditions have been met.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is a very important point that the Senator from New York just made.

Mr. JAVITS. Sure it is.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It is a vitally important point which I want to address later on.

Mr. JAVITS. Sure it is.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. It is of great significance, because the sanctions would be lifted regardless of the attitude of the United Nations.

Mr. JAVITS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I agree with that statement, but it would be done with Presidential action.

Mr. JAVITS. All he does is find the two facts. He does not lift the sanctions. That is lifted by virtue of this act.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator from New York yield 2 minutes to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I shall be glad to follow the distinguished Senator from Virginia if he has some remarks prepared.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Go right ahead.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Senator very much.

Mr. President, I should like to propose some replies to the statement of the distinguished Senator from Iowa, in which he made a number of statements about the present situation in the transitional government in Rhodesia.

He has pointed out correctly that it is not a democracy. I should like to point out that it does not claim to be as yet. What we have in Salisbury is a transitional government struggling toward a democracy, toward elections, toward majority rule. At the present time, the people running the government, including the executive council and the ministers—one of each race in each ministry—are pretty much self-appointed. They are not there, because of the democratic process.

The Senator from Iowa is very critical of the fact that they have had no elections. The transition to a democratic government has been made virtually impossible by the fact that the terrorists of the Patriotic Front are doing their best to prevent any election from taking place and the Government is so busy fighting terrorist attacks upon outlying areas of Rhodesia that it is almost impossible to conduct elections. I need not go over the shocking stories of very, very recent terrorist attacks, when, for example, very recently, the Patriotic Front terrorists massacred 12 whites at the Anglican Emmanuel Mission School, 18 miles southeast of Umtali. These were totally random murders committed against women, children, and missionaries, who are totally unarmed, totally unable to help themselves, totally unable to defend themselves.

These attacks are made not only against whites but against blacks. Subsequent to the Emmanuel Mission massacre on July 1, Patriotic Front terrorists butchered 14 black civilians on a black farm compound in the Headlands area 140 kilometers east of Salisbury.

A few days later, two more missionaries were slaughtered by terrorists. Then, just a few days ago, a convoy of civilians traveling south from Kariba were killed by the "Freedom Fighters" of the Patriotic Front.

I have been told by members of the Patriotic Front that they are not Communists just because they use Communist weapons. However, my informants in Rhodesia have told me the political training notebooks taken from Mr. Robert Mugabe's soldiers shows quite clearly the Communist indoctrination; Communist sources of those handbooks show very, very clearly, that these people are trained, nurtured, supplied by the Communists.

Another important point that the distinguished Senator from Iowa makes is that the dismissal of Byron Hove, a black from the ministry, indicates that whites are very much still in charge.

I wonder if the Senator from Iowa is aware of the fact that Byron Hove, a black London lawyer, arrived in Salisbury on February 13, 1978, and on February 14 he began to announce how the whole Department of Justice was going to be reorganized without having taken the trouble first to find out what reorganization plans were cooking, without finding out what the present state of affairs was within that department, and his dismissal, therefore, is not the act simply of Mr. Ian Smith, but certainly, completely backed up by Chief Chirau and Reverend Sithole.

How can an election be held under conditions now prevailing; and to lift the sanctions is not under the amendments proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

The first one asks they be lifted for 1 year only and the present amendment asks that they be lifted only until the end of this year, until December 31.

At the end of that time, the sanctions can be reimposed. The moment we discover they cannot hold elections or have been unable to do so, or for any other reason that we are not satisfied with their progress, we could reimpose those sanctions—and we are not talking about lifting them permanently, without putting conditions on the lifting of those sanctions.

I am amused always by those who worry upsetting our relations with the United Nations by taking some course of action which the United Nations would not approve of. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this amendment does not violate our relationship with the United Nations. The United Nations has itself violated that relationship with the United States long ago and many, many, many times.

I have been for a long time an enthusiastic supporter of the United Nations. When the United Nations met to organize itself in San Francisco in 1945, no one was happier about it than I was.

But in recent years, the United Nations has become a forum of anti-American propaganda and of ganging up on any American desire and any American interest.

Why we continue to support it under those changed conditions and court their good will, I simply cannot understand.

I am not at all sure that the distinguished Senator from Iowa is correct in saying that an amendment of this kind will destroy our relationships with all African nations. A number of nations that permitted the unanimous resolution on the part of the Organization of African Unity to pass unanimously, they simply do not vote or raise their voice when they are in a conference surrounded by people with louder voices than their own.

The Senator from Iowa is perfectly familiar with this phenomenon among all of us who tend to keep quiet among noisy spokesmen of other points of view.

Let me call attention to the fact that Botswana, Liberia, Gabon, the Ivory Coast, a number of African nations, Senegal, and so on, are not at all enthusiastic about the Patriotic Front, at the same time as they are not all that enthusiastic about the internal settlement, either.

But to say that we shall permanently alienate these nations by any actions we may take, seems to me to me highly inferential.

The important thing about our relations with Africa is that we have permitted Communist influence to spread itself in Angola, Communist takeovers in Ethiopia and Namibia and elsewhere, and we have never raised a finger to protest. We have never raised a voice in protest in all this takeover of Africa by Communists from Russia and Cuba.

This very small measure of resistance to this takeover simply by temporarily lifting of sanctions to give the Government of Rhodesia a chance to organize itself seems to me to be a very mild and modest way of saying, "You just can't go on this way forever."

The important thing, however, the fear I have about the Case-Javits-Moynihan amendment, is to look at it from the point of view of the Patriotic Front.

This amendment makes the lifting of the sanctions conditional upon their holding elections in Rhodesia.

The Patriotic Front has announced already that it will prevent elections from taking place, will make every polling place a target for terrorist attacks.

So if you were a member of the Patriotic Front, or a leader of it, what would you do in order to prevent the sanctions from being lifted? You would see to it that those elections could never be held. You would see to it that every polling place is so surrounded by terrorists that everybody would be afraid to go and vote. So there would be no election.

We are, by the Case-Javits-Moynihan amendment, almost inviting the Patriotic Front to come in and not let them have elections and then they will have nothing more to worry about our lifting sanctions.

This particular consequence of the wording of this amendment, in this form, does not seem to have been thought out by the proponents of it.

Mr. President, we are actually assisting totalitarian forces that could not conduct their campaign of massacre against innocent black Rhodesians if they were not given a safe haven and supported by neighboring states. We offer subsidies to these neighboring states.

I, personally, in the first days of June this year, had an audience with President Kenneth Kaunda of Zambia. I asked him in all seriousness how it was that he, who had won the Martin Luther King Nonviolent Peace Prize, is harboring terrorists of the Patriotic Front within his own borders. He said that there are limits to nonviolence.

I was perfectly willing to grant that, but to go beyond those limits, how does one get the Martin Luther King Nonviolent Peace Prize?

Well, he got it and he had no answer to that question.

The impression I got, Mr. President, is that President Kenneth Kaunda, with all his protestations of Christianity, with all his protestations of being a lover of peace, with the hymns he sings and and the spirituals he loves to lead in song, is a pious fraud.

He is really a believer in violence. I did not say these things to him, of course, but I asked him further, "Why do you permit the Patriotic Front troops within your own country to murder and pillage your own citizens and rape your own women?"

He said, in effect, "Well, soldiers will be soldiers, as boys will be boys."

It seemed that he was unwilling to lift his hand to protect his own population from the violence of the terrorists, the foreign terrorists, he was harboring within his own country.

So Kenneth Kauda is no prize. He is not a person we can take any pride in allying ourselves with. There is no need to court his good will.

His country is suffering desperately economically and can only be propped up by us, by aid from the World Bank, or by military aid from the Communist nations. These are the people we are supporting.

I am not opposed to assisting nations with economic difficulties, but we should at least make our assistance conditional upon their refraining from encouraging armed bands to go marauding across a neighbor's border. This is very deeply true of Mozambique as it is of Zambia. If we were to conduct ourselves in that way, we would be serving two important principles—a principle of international law and a principle reflecting our national dedication to nonviolence in the settlement of disputes.

There is no indication in either branch of the patriotic front, that led by Nkomo or that led by Mugabe, that there is any dedication whatever to nonviolence. Indeed, the evidence is entirely to the contrary. They are terrorists from both wings of the Patriotic Front. They are determined to have their way by terrorism, not simply with the barrel of a gun but with chopping people up, scattering their remains over the fields, in order to create terror, in order to intimidate people, in order to create in them such fear that they will not dare raise their voices in protest of any kind.

We hear from the policymakers expressions of concern that the Patriotic Front has to be brought into the agreement. I wonder whether people realize that leaders of the Patriotic Front wander around Salisbury with complete freedom.

I had dinner with the vice president of the Patriotic Front, the ZAPU forces, Mr. Chinamano, in the Michael's Hotel in Salisbury. One would think that the enemy of Rhodesia would not be free to wander around in Salisbury. But Mr. Chinamano brought three of his staff members into the dining room of the Michael's Hotel. They were not frisked; they were not searched; they were not queried by the security officers, if there were any security officers, because the Salisbury Government has lifted the ban on them and said, in effect, "This is a country with free speech and civil rights."

So the only questions that were asked of these Patriotic Front leaders—it was true of Chinamano and his guests that day; it was true of Mr. Albert Mugabe and his wife. Mr. Albert Mugabe is the brother of Robert Mugabe. They, too, came to Michael's Hotel, and they were not searched or frisked in any way. The only questions asked of them were, for example, "Will you have your roast rare, medium, or well done? Will you have red wine or white?"

These are the kinds of civil liberties they enjoy there.

So there is a very important respect in which Rhodesia is developing, a nation in which there are all kinds of civil liberties already available, despite the dangers they are under, and those civil liberties are likely to be expanded.

So, Mr. President, what I am saying is that to make the lifting of sanctions contingent upon the holding of elections is to encourage an intensification rather than a reduction of conflict. The Patriotic Front has declared publicly that it will not allow elections to take place.

If we say that we will lift the sanctions against the transitional government when elections have taken place, all we are doing is encouraging the Patriotic Front to determine that that never happens. This means a permanent state of bloodshed, a permanent state of civil war within Rhodesia; and after that, if the Patriotic Front has prevailed, the likelihood is that that forces led by Nkomo will fight the forces led by Mugabe. In one way or another, we are dooming Rhodesia to continued bloodshed if we continue in our present course.

I thank the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator for his most enlightening remarks. I wish we had even more time for him to describe his personal observations when he was in Rhodesia, experiences which the rest of us have not had. The distinguished Senator from California is exceedingly well informed on the subject, and I am honored that he is supporting my amendment.

Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 29 minutes remaining on his amendment, of which 20 minutes have been reserved for the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina has done a magnificent job over a long period of time in attempting to have the embargo on trade with Rhodesia lifted. I hope the Senator from North Carolina can succeed. He is fighting a worthy battle against great odds.

The United States has been totally unfair, in my judgment, over a long period of time to that little country of Rhodesia.

There is every reason in the world why the trade embargo on Rhodesia should be lifted now. The Rhodesians themselves, by an internal settlement with the three moderate black leaders on the one side and Prime Minister Ian Smith on the other, have gotten together among themselves and have worked out plans for elections to be held before the end of this year.

Mr. President, the problem that Rhodesia faces is not internally in Rhodesia. The problem Rhodesia faces more than anything else is the United States. The extremists in the State Department are demanding that the Russian oriented guerillas be brought into the Rhodesian Government.

The extremists in the State Department are demanding that the guerrillas who are killing Rhodesians—guerrillas operating from outside the borders of Rhodesia—be brought into the new Rhodesian Government.

Mr. President, if the State Department has its way, and it appears that it will, I am confident that Rhodesia will be the next African country to fall under the domination of the Soviet Union. I would think that our country would feel that we already have enough African countries being dominated by Communist Russia. But apparently that is not the case with an extremist element in the State Department who has control of our African policy.

The assertion has been made time and again on the floor of the Senate today that the role of the United States is that of an honest broker, that it is not up to the United States to take sides. I wish the State Department would adhere to that. The State Department has taken sides. The United States is not an honest broker. The United States is trying to force the three black moderate leaders in Rhodesia and Ian Smith to accept, in the new government Russian-oriented guerrilla leaders.

I support wholeheartedly the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina. I commend him for the valiant fight that he has made previously and is making today. I deplore the action and the attitude of our own State Department in its handling of the affairs of Southern Africa.

There is, however, one redeeming feature about what is happening in the Senate today, and I watched with great interest and some amusement the last rollcall vote which had voting for the amendment which was approved by the Senate, the Case-Javits amendment, most of the Senators who through the years have been saying that the United States cannot unilaterally lift the embargo.

I shall read what one Senator said several years ago, when he led the fight to repeal the then Byrd amendment dealing with permitting trade with Rhodesia insofar as the purchase of chrome is concerned. The Senator said at that point:

> The United Nations charter as adopted by the Congress of the United States and ratified by the Senate has the same standing as a provision of our Constitution. It is a supreme law of the land.

It was that argument which more than any other brought about the repeal of the Byrd amendment which did permit the purchase of chrome from Rhodesia.

But today I am happy to say that there has been a change of sentiment in the Senate, and I am delighted at that. I am just delighted, and I want the word to go back to the United Nations just what is happening here today because I think it is a very happy day for the American people. The Senate is changing its attitude. The Senate has by recorded vote taken steps which one of the authors of the amendment, the distinguished Senator from New York, says that by the amendment "We are providing for the lifting of the sanctions." And then the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the ranking member of the Foreign Relations Committee, queried the Senator from New York and said, "Is it not a fact that this amendment would lift the embargo on trade with Rhodesia?" And the able Senator from New York answered in three words, yes, yes, yes.

So I think that sets at rest the assertion that has been made on the floor of the Senate year after year and year after year, that the United States unilaterally cannot lift that embargo. Of course, it can.

I took issue with that assertion going back 5 and 6 and 7 years ago and year before last and last year, but today is the first day that the Senate has had a statement from those who in the past have favored an embargo on Rhodesia, that the Senate itself, Congress itself, can by its own action repeal the embargo.

So while I fear that the amendment offered by my friend from North Carolina, Senator HELMS, may not prevail today, nevertheless I think what is happening in the Senate today because he presented this amendment will have significant and far-reaching implications, and I am very delighted with the assertions which have been made several times that the amendment just adopted by the Senate does provide for the lifting of the sanctions. I hope that the Senate, having recognized that Congress can lift the sanctions, which of course it seemed to me to be obvious from the start, will go one step further and adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS) and lift the sanctions now rather than delay that action until it may be too late to keep that little country of Rhodesia from falling under the domination of Communist Russia.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has consumed 10 minutes of his time.

Who yields time?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I commend my able colleague from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). He has been in the forefront of the fight long before I came to the Senate in trying to see that justice is done to the people of Rhodesia.

I commend him on his remarks today and I assure him that I am honored to have his support for this amendment.

Mr. President, do I understand I have approximately 8 minutes remaining of my time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair, and I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished Senator from New Mexico and the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

How much time do the Senators desire?

Mr. DOLE. Two minutes.

Mr. SCHMITT. I appreciate that. I will take 6 minutes.

Mr. HELMS. I yield to the Senators in whatever order they wish.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, as my colleagues may recall when we debated this issue last year I spoke generally in the context of the national interest of this country, particularly with respect to the imports of chrome.

Today, I will let that discussion stand in the RECORD and call my colleagues' attention to it. But today I shall speak more with respect to the economic ties that we must have with Rhodesia.

Mr. President, since I last spoke in favor of continued economic ties with Rhodesia, the developing situation has only confirmed my support of such ties. The embargo has done nothing but make the search for majority democracy more difficult.

During the past few days I have reviewed the Senate debate on the Rhodesian trade embargo which took place in March of 1977. The remarks of a number of my colleagues who voted to impose the embargo are worth further consideration. While numerous arguments were presented in support of the embargo, the major point seemed to be that the embargo would bring pressure to bear on the Smith government to move toward majority rule.

One of my colleagues stated that the embargo in itself would not be sufficient to bring about majority rule but that it would aid in that effort. Mr. President, if majority rule was the purpose of the embargo, then with the Salisbury agreement the purpose of the embargo has been achieved. Whether it was achieved because of or in spite of the embargo is another question. If, in fact, the embargo was responsible, then the results were beyond the expectations of this Senator, and maybe beyond the expectations of its proponents.

Another argument presented in last year's debate was that the embargo would let the white minority government know that the United States would not support it in its continued policy of denying political rights to the black majority. Major steps toward majority rule have been taken since that argument was presented to this body. The transition government is composed of blacks, highly respected black leaders. A constitution is now a reality. Elections are planned. Rhodesia is rapidly moving toward a democracy which will be based on majority rule and the protection of minority rights.

An argument presented by another colleague was that the United States must make it clear to the world that we favor majority rule in Rhodesia. Rhodesians now have majority rule, true democracy, within their reach. If we desire to make it clear to the world that we favor majority rule then we must lift the embargo. We must first reward the steps which have been taken toward democracy. We must give that infant democracy the protection it requires so that it can grow strong. We must make majority rule a reality.

Mr. President, one Senator, though supporting the imposition of the embargo last year, correctly pointed out that great care must be taken with embargos lest they become counterproductive. He felt, however, that in this case the embargo should be used to pressure the Rhodesian Government to accept changes.

Changes have occurred. The governmental structure mentioned in that statement no longer exists. A transition government is in place. Should we continue the embargo, we will cause the situation to worsen. We are being told that by the most respected black leader in Rhodesia. Why do we refuse to believe what Bishop Muzorewa is telling us? He and other black leaders must contend with the results of their work and the interference of others, yet we seem to feel that we know what is best for Rhodesia, and they do not. This, it seems, is the height of arrogance and counter to the American tradition and belief in self-determination.

One statement made in last year's debate was that "we act in defense of majority rule; we act in defense of racial equality." That statement is appropriate today in the lifting of the embargo. Majority rule is being achieved. Racial equality is in sight. The government which will take office next year will be one elected by the people in an election in which all people, black and white, will be allowed to participate.

Mr. President, I find it disturbing that the United States is unwilling to remove an embargo which has achieved its stated purpose—that of forcing the Rhodesian Government to accept majority rule. Now, we are being asked to lift that embargo by the black leaders of Rhodesia. Why are we not willing to allow Rhodesians the economic base upon which will be determined their destiny? Why are we denying them this economic base at the same time we insist that they take unto their bosom the guerrillas that will destroy a free Rhodesia?

These guerrillas forces do not want majority rule. I think that is clear. What will it take to convince us of that fact? Another Vietnam? I certainly hope not. There are many who will help stir up trouble for the majority in Rhodesia. That we can count on their aims are not so pure as those who sincerely felt an embargo was necessary, in the first place, their aims are our destruction and the destruction of freedom on this planet.

Mr. President, I find it extremely disturbing that the United States is insisting that majority rule can only be achieved if guerrillas who have stated that they are not interested in democracy are included in the Government. I fear that unless the United States changes its policy, stops supporting the position of the guerrilla forces, and lifts the embargo as an endorsement of democracy, we will compromise our position in the world as the leader of free nations, and do absolutely nothing to help the people of Rhodesia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN). The Senator's 6 minutes have expired.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, finally, I would like to compliment the distinguished Senator from North Carolina on his efforts and to say that I give him my full support.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Senator from New Mexico.

I yield the remainder of my time—I understand it is 3 minutes—to the Senator from Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are remaining 2 minutes.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I support the amendment offered by Mr. HELMS, to lift the trade embargo against the biracial Government of Rhodesia. The leaders of Rhodesia, both black and white, achieved an internal agreement on March 3, 1978, after years of difficult bargaining, which provides for a peaceful transition to majority rule in that country and protects the rights and interests of all of its citizens. It is a great achievement, and an opportunity for self-determination which must not be allowed to deteriorate.

FRAGILE OPPORTUNITY

But this opportunity has been jeopardized by two factors: The failure of the United States to recognize the legitimacy of the agreement, and our refusal to loosen the economic embargo against Rhodesia. Allowing the Rhodesians a chance to try and make their own solution work should be the primary concern. But the serious economic straits they are experiencing threaten to overcome this chance for peaceful transition—an economic crisis which has been caused and maintained by the trade embargo. At the very least, the interim leaders deserve a chance to overcome their perilous situation, to resist the violence and chaos which are certain to follow if the internal settlement fails.

Despite the almost universal trade and arms embargo against Rhodesia, the interim transition government has so far managed to withstand the pressures of Marxist insurgency. It has managed to withstand the pressures of internal differences, as well, and is moving steadily toward a nationwide referendum, in which all black and white Rhodesian citizens over the age of 18 will be able to vote for a new government of their own choice. That government, under the new constitution, will take office on the first day of 1979.

As the conflict in Ethiopia winds down, and as the State Department tries to defuse the Angolan-Zaire confrontation, we must confront the very real possibility that Soviet and Cuban forces will decide next to involve themselves directly in Rhodesian affairs. Developments in this regard will affect the peace of all southern Africa. With the Soviets arming and the Cubans training Rhodesian guerrillas in the area, this prospect is certainly not out of question.

Last March, I introduced Senate Concurrent Resolution 69, endorsing the interim biracial government in Rhodesia. I believed then, and I believe now, that the internal settlement was a positive step toward resolving internal differences in Rhodesia, and a repudiation of the violence encouraged by external Marxist forces. That resolution has 12 cosponsors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of Senate Concurrent Resolution 69 be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 69

Whereas, the present constitutional situation in Rhodesia has led to armed conflict within Rhodesia and from neighboring territories;

Whereas, the United States, in concert with its allies, has lent its efforts during the past several years towards a resolution of conflict in Rhodesia through transition arrangements for Majority Rule;

Whereas, on March 3, 1978, delegates of the Rhodesian Government, African National Council, United African National Council, and the Zimbabwe United People's Organization reached agreement on fundamental principles to be embodied in a new constitution for Rhodesia, and designated December 31, 1978, as independence day: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (House of Representatives concurring), that it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that—

(1) the agreement reached in Salisbury, Rhodesia, on March 3, 1978, relating to transition to Majority Rule for Rhodesia, is a positive step towards settlement of internal differences and towards peace within the region; and

(2) the agreement is a vindication of the principle of peaceful settlement of local disputes by local parties, and a repudiation of the path of violence encouraged by certain external Communist powers; and

(3) the agreement merits the strong endorsement and the support of the American People and the United States Government; and

(4) the President of the United States should instruct the United States Ambassador to the United Nations to lend his dedicated efforts towards gaining international support for the internal agreement.

WESTERN SUPPORT CRUCIAL

Mr. DOLE. Let there be no mistake about it: Our continuing indifference toward the internal settlement does not signal neutrality. It works only to the favor of the rebels. Further delay in Western support for the biracial, interim settlement only courts disaster. Would it not be better to endorse and insure the success of the multiracial government, which is committed to peaceful transition, rather than allow it to fall at the hands of Cuban-trained terrorists? When one considers the possible alternative to this effort to build a majority government through peaceful means, made even more difficult through the great economic and political pressures which have been brought to bear on Rhodesia, the wisdom and fairness of continuing the embargo as it stands must be seriously doubted.

For this reason, I feel compelled to support the amendment offered by my colleague from North Carolina. Such a step could give the democratic regime the stability and support, both economic and moral, which it needs to help it through this difficult period. I supported a similar proposal offered by Mr. HELMS on the 28th of July, under the Defense Department authorization bill. I still am of the opinion that it is a worthy motion, which takes into account the gravity of the situation and the special needs of Rhodesia at this time. During this period when the transitional government is struggling to provide the economic and social stability for the free elections coming up in December of this year, it is vital that we do not undermine that effort.

Mr. President, in 2 minutes you cannot possibly restate all the arguments that have been made. I think they have all been made. They are all very good. Some of them I can agree with and some I cannot.

But we were on this floor yesterday saying, "Lift the embargo. It will bring peace, lift the embargo."

We are on the same floor today saying, "Don't lift the embargo and bring peace."

You have the administration running in two different directions at the same time, which is probably an understatement. Maybe consistency is not a virtue, but I think there should be some consistency here.

I believe now, as I did last March when I introduced a resolution cosponsored by 12 Senators, that the internal settlement was a positive step toward resolving internal differences in Rhodesia and a repudiation of the violence encouraged by the external Marxist forces.

It would seem to me that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina has given us an opportunity to try to encourage some settlement in Rhodesia. That is all we want is a settlement. It just seems to me we can talk and display the rhetoric all we want to, but the facts are the facts.

I earlier heard today the distinguished Senator from Virginia speak with great eloquence about the situation in Rhodesia today and how we failed to respond properly. It just seems to this Senator that we have that opportunity now. I certainly support the amendment and urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On whose time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 54 minutes.

Mr. CASE. Let it go for a couple of minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I do not believe we have further requests for time in opposition. The arguments, it seems to me, have all been made. The issues are quite clear, and I am prepared to have the chairman of the subcommittee and myself yield back the remainder of our time in opposition.

Has the Senator used his time?

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that?

Mr. CASE. Of course, I withhold it. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the same basis as before, the clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield myself 4 minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, in view of the significant action taken by the Senate today in adopting the Case-Javits amendment which, according to the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), provides for the lifting of sanctions against Rhodesia, I think it well to read into the RECORD at this point assertions by U.S. courts on the subject as to whether Congress can unilaterally lift the trade embargo with Rhodesia.

On June 19, 1972, in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia, and in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia on October 31, 1972, the proposition that the United States has somehow surrendered its sovereignty to the United Nations was soundly rejected. Upon appeal, on April 16, 1973, the lower court decisions were let stand by the Supreme Court.

In its dismissal of the suit which sought to declare the Byrd amendment illegal the district court wrote:

> Congress has the Constitutional authority to abrogate in whole or in part, the treaty obligations of the United States. . . . This was a political, economic, and foreign policy determination. It is not for this Court to strike down . . . The voters of our country are the only ones in this case who may judge the actions of their representatives.

In upholding the district court's decision the U.S. court of appeals wrote:

> It is settled constitutional doctrine that Congress may nullify, in whole or in part, a treaty commitment.
> We think that there can be no blinking the purpose and effect of the Byrd Amendment. It was to detach this country from the U.N. Boycott of Southern Rhodesia . . .
> . . . Under our constitutional scheme, Congress can denounce treaties if it sees fit to do so, and there is nothing the other branches of government can do about it. We consider that this is precisely what Congress has done in this case; and therefore the District Court was correct to the extent that it found the complaint to state no tenable claim in law.

On April 16, 1973, the Supreme Court denied certiorari, in effect upholding the previous court decisions.

So when the Senate today took action as it just did which provides for the lifting of the embargo on Rhodesia under certain conditions, the Senate acted fully within its constitutional rights. I say again, I hope the Senate will go one step further, and approve the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS).

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, the adoption of the Helms amendment to the International Security Assistance bill we are considering today would provide the Soviet Union and its Cuban allies in Africa with a propaganda coup more damaging to U.S. diplomacy than any event I can imagine at this time.

In March of last year, the U.S. Congress sent a strong signal to the Rhodesian regime. By repealing the Byrd amendment which had allowed this country to import Rhodesian chrome and other minerals in violation of U.N. resolutions, we placed ourselves once again in compliance with our international obligations and let it be known that the United States would deepen its active commitment in the search for a negotiated end to minority rule. The removal of the Byrd amendment also dealt the President a strong hand which he has used in gaining acceptance of America's credentials as an honest broker in the effort to find a peaceful and lasting settlement to the conflicts in Rhodesia and Namibia. We have already witnessed how working in this fashion the United States, our allies, the participants to the conflict and other interested parties can achieve a political solution which holds the promise of reducing the loss of human lives and the amount of human misery which a military solution can never hope to do.

The South West African People's Organization (SWAPO) on July 12 accepted the proposals put forward by the United States and four other members of the U.N. Security Council already accepted by South Africa for a peaceful settlement of the Namibia question. We are on a similar track with respect to the Rhodesian conflict. The key, of course, is to assure that all parties are given an opportunity to compete peacefully in impartially held elections agreed upon by the "internal" and "external" nationalists.

This is the essence of the diplomatic effort now underway by the United States and Great Britain. Its aim is to save lives and prevent a tribal and racial war from erupting in southern Africa. Only Soviet and Cuban purposes would be well-served by such an event.

I know my colleagues share with me the great sense of sadness and disgust over the atrocities which have already occurred in fighting between the Rhodesian regime and forces of the Patriotic Front. This is why I repeat that the aim of our efforts to maintain U.S. compliance with U.N. Security Council sanctions is to sustain our credibility with the so-called black confrontation states bordering Rhodesia persuading them that we are serious about facilitating a peaceful transition to majority rule. Without such credibility we will see the option of a negotiated settlement foreclosed leaving only resort to full-scale civil war and the bloodbath which will follow.

As much as we may disapprove of the public statements of the ZAPU and ZANU representatives and welcome the long overdue decision of Ian Smith to step down, we cannot in clear conscience deny the reality of the disaster which is likely to ensue if our diplomatic efforts fail. The present "internal" settlement is just not enough. That is why we have a deep moral obligation to persist armed not with weapons of war but with the political strength stemming from our Nation's determination to live up to our U.N. obligations and live by the rule of international law.●

TOWARD PEACE AND MAJORITY RULE IN RHODESIA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am strongly opposed to the proposal of the Senator from North Carolina to suspend U.S. participation in the United Nations sanctions on Rhodesia for the remainder of this year.

The United States and United Kingdom have been making important efforts to convene an all-parties conference, with a view to impartially supervised elections and peaceful transition toward early majority rule in Rhodesia. The administration has been right to press for fair participation in the transition government by the principal parties—those in the Salisbury Government and those in the External Patriotic Front.

We have fresh evidence of the success of this approach in nearby Namibia. As a result of agreement by South Africa, SWAPO, and five western members of the U.N. Security Council, Namibia is on its way at long last to a cease-fire and peaceful transition to independence and majority rule. This is the continuation of 15 months of patient U.S. negotiations, working within the U.N. framework and obtaining the support of all parties and key black African states. Indeed, the same African states who supported our efforts so strongly in Namibia will be even more critical in our efforts to achieve peace and majority rule in Rhodesia or Zimbabwe.

But the Senator from North Carolina would dispense with the United Nations framework—flouting our treaty obligations to adhere to sanctions sponsored and voted for by the United States and approved by the Security Council, in which of course the United States has veto power as a permanent member.

He would undermine our joint efforts with our British allies, abandoning the even-handedness of the Anglo-American plan and infusing dollars, oil and the machinery of war to Ian Smith and his confederates. He would have us share with South Africa the dubious distinction of being the only nations in the world to trade openly with Rhodesia.

Under the Byrd amendment which the Senate repealed (66 to 26) last year, the United States had imported Rhodesian chrome and other minerals. Now Senator HELMS would have us lift the floodgates to trade entirely, providing material and moral support to one side to the conflict.

If we were to adopt the Helms amendment or its equivalents, the damage to our relations with Africa would dwarf that of the Byrd amendment. We would forfeit, in one stroke, our crucial position as honest broker among all parties. We would alienate the frontline states and our many other friends and allies in Africa—all of whom have been impressed with our evenhandedness and commitment to peace and majority rule in Rhodesia. We would rebuff the Patriotic Front, which has agreed to attend an all-parties conference—and embrace the Salisbury Government, which has not agreed to do so.

Mr. President, the key to peace in Rhodesia is the inclusion of all major parties—internal and external—in a cease-fire, in an all-parties conference, in fairly and impartially administered elections, and in rapid transition to majority rule. A settlement without the Patriotic Front or a settlement without the Salisbury Government will lead only to more bloodshed and more chaos.

Let us not destroy our capacity as peacemakers by favoring one side over the other. Let us not set back our negotiations in Rhodesia, and possibly in Namibia as well, by discrediting ourselves before Africa and the world. Let us not back ourselves into a glass house and invite others to throw stones.

Instead, let us adhere to the course adopted by the last administration as well as the current one, the course confirmed by our repeal of the Byrd amendment last year. This is the course of peace and majority rule in Rhodesia—the conditions which will make it possible for all United Nations members, including the United States, to resume trade with a peaceful, free, and united Zimbabwe.●

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I ask unanimous consent that the time be charged equally to both sides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered. Is the Senator specifying time on the bill?

Mr. CASE. Is there any other time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On the amendment.

Mr. CASE. Put it on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time will be on the amendment. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time. I understand Senator HELMS has no time remaining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER Does the Senator from Virginia yield back the remainder of his time?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All remaining time is yielded back.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1507

(Purpose: To amend the United Nations participation Act of 1943 with respect to Southern Rhodesia)

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Missouri (Mr. DANFORTH) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1507.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

At the end of unprinted amendment No. 1504, as amended, add the following: Provided further, That section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

By adding at the end of subsection (a) the following: "Except that in recognition of the settlement of March 3, 1978, reached by leaders representing a majority of Southern Rhodesians, no Executive order issued under this subsection and applying measures against Southern Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable through December 31, 1978.";

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, this is a perfecting amendment to the Hayakawa amendment as amended. This amendment is very similar to the Helms substitute.

It would lift sanctions until December 31. But there is a very important difference, one that should be of great importance to the Senate.

My amendment is not a substitute. It would amend the Hayakawa amendment by adding language to the end of the language of the Case-Javits amendment. In other words, it would not repudiate the action which the Senate has already taken this afternoon; instead, it would add to the concerns expressed in the amendment of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

The practical effect of my amendment would be to insure that sanctions would be lifted for a definite period, from October 1 to December 31. It would not take anything away from the discretionary authority which the Senate has already approved this afternoon.

Thus the Senate has spelled out its concerns—for negotiations with the Patriotic Front, for free elections, for international observers at those elections, for Presidential discretionary authority. My amendment would leave all of that language in place. It would put all Rhodesians on notice that this is what the Senate expects.

At the same time, it would reward those first bold steps which the Rhodesians have taken with the internal agreement. It would offer a time certain for the Rhodesians.

The effect of this amendment, therefore, would be to suspend the enforcement of sanctions for 3 months, from October 1 to December 31. This is the most critical period for the success of the agreement. By lifting the sanctions on a date certain, it could give positive encouragement to the democratic groups. But by delaying the lifting of sanctions for 2 months, it gives the administration time to point out to the guerrilla groups that a democratic Zimbabwe is in the making, and that they had better join the electoral process if they want to continue to have the diplomatic support of the United States.

Although, from an economic standpoint, it would be better to lift sanctions immediately to get the economy going again, it is perhaps more important to make a last-ditch effort to bring in the parties who seem to fear the effects of the democratic process. At any rate, with a date certain, Rhodesia can begin planning and negotiating for trade and investment. On October 1, sanctions would be lifted, and the actual event would provide a shot in the arm for the morale of the country, and have a beneficial impact on confidence in the elcctoral process.

December 31, however, provides a failsafe terminal date. On that date, sanctions would go back in force technically. However, what it really does is to provide an opportunity for the President and the Secretary of State to review the situation. If Prime Minister Smith, Bishop Muzorewa, the Rev. Mr. Sithole, and Senator-Chief Chirau have not kept their promises—if they have not maintained an openness to the guerrilla leaders on democratic terms and they have not held fair elections in which all can participate—then the President need do nothing.

The pressure would be back upon the transitional government. On the other hand, we have every reason to expect that they will keep their promises, and that a democratic, multiracial government will be installed on December 31. If that happens, I am fully confident that the President would exercise his authority to suspend sanctions, authority already existing in the law. He could use his discretion to suspend sanctions for another temporary period, if there was some doubt over conditions then existing, or he could suspend them permanently.

Thus, this amendment, unlike the Helms substitute, goes further to preserve the President's discretion, and gives him an opportunity to work for peaceful transition. On the other hand, it also would demonstrate the desire of the Senate to offer meaningful, concrete assurances to the democratic forces in Rhodesia.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. DANFORTH. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. So that we are clear, how does the pending amendment differ from the Helms amendment, other than putting in the sanctions 6 or 7 weeks late?

Mr. DANFORTH. Well, it differs from the Helms amendment in two respects. First of all, it keeps intact all the language of the Case amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I understand.

Mr. DANFORTH. Second, instead of the lifting of the embargo taking place on the signing of the bill into law by the President, it would take effect on October 1, which is the beginning of the next fiscal year.

Mr. CLARK. So the effect of the Senator's amendment would be to lift sanctions October 1 through the end of December.

Mr. DANFORTH. That is correct, for 3 months.

Mr. CLARK. And the effect of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina would be to lift sanctions immediately and end on December 31.

Mr. DANFORTH. And also the Senator from North Carolina has a substitute for the Case amendment, thereby wiping out everything in the Case amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I understand that distinction, and it is an important one.

Mr. DANFORTH. I think the major difference, as a matter of fact, between this proposal and the Case proposal is that under this proposal the sanctions would not be in force at the time of the election. It would be merely a 3-month hiatus in the existence of the sanctions, the theory being that if the sanctions are in force at the time of the election, and if only the free and open election would trigger the sanction, that provides a tremendous incentive for the patriotic front to increase its guerrilla activity for the sake of preventing the kind of elections which are envisioned by the Case amendment.

Mr. CLARK. I believe I understand the Senator's amendment. I would oppose it on the ground that it does very much the same thing as the Helms amendment only somewhat later. Obviously, if the Helms amendment were passed, there would be no such pressure with regard to the Patriotic Front's activities. It seems to me that the only substantive difference is when the Senator is going to do it. If the Helms amendment passed the House of Representatives and was signed by the President, it would probably go into effect in mid-August; this would go into effect the first of October, notwithstanding the Senator's explanation about the Javits-Case amendment continuing to stand. It would mean, in effect, that we were going to lift the sanctions against the government before they had an election and without their committing themselves to negotiating in good faith in an all-parties conference, would it not?

Mr. DANFORTH. That is correct.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. While I would much prefer to see the sanctions lifted immediately, I say to the Senator that if his perfecting amendment is approved, I shall withdraw my amendment. I commend the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. Will the Senator yield for one further question?

Mr. DANFORTH. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. It seems to me that even though the Senator's amendment were adopted, even though it simply tags on language to the already passed Javits-Case-Moynihan amendment, it has the effect of negating that, because the Javits-Case-Moynihan amendment requires that elections are observed and requires the Government to commit itself to participate in negotiations. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri lifts sanctions so that neither of those conditions would have any opportunity to be met. So it is in contradiction to what we have already passed. Is that correct?

Mr. DANFORTH. No; I would not say that because the sanctions would only be lifted for a period of 3 months. If the purpose of sanctions is to insure free, fair and open elections and the orderly transfer of power to the majority, and even the willingness to negotiate, as a matter of fact, with the so-called Patriotic Front, if those conditions are not met then the sanctions automatically would be reimposed under the terms of the Case amendment. So the full force and effect of the Case amendment, the full pressure of that amendment, for the holding of open elections, internationally supervised, and for the willingness to negotiate with the Patriotic Front would be in effect because if those conditions were not met then on January 1 automatically the effect of the Case amendment would be felt by Rhodesia.

Really, the only effect of this is to say that it is a very dangerous tactical mistake to have with the Case amendment the sanctions to be in effect necessarily until the date of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I yield.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask that it be in order that I may ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a request for the yeas and nays at this time? Without objection, it is in order.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, if I might, I would like to ask the Senator from Missouri where in his amendment as it is drawn could one conclude that the sanctions would be lifted on October 1? I read the entire amendment. It says:

At the end of unprinted amendment No. 1504, as amended, add the following: Provided further, That Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

By adding at the end of subsection (a) the following: Except that in recognition of the settlement of March 3, 1978, reached by leaders representing a majority of Southern Rhodesians, no Executive order issued under this subsection and applying measures against Southern Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable through December 31, 1978.";

Mr. DANFORTH. The answer to that is section 46 of the bill on page 31. It provides for an effective date for the bill and provides that the amendments made by the act shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Mr. CLARK. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I yield myself such time as I may require.

Mr. HELMS. Will the Senator yield 1 minute?

Mr. CASE. I yield 1 minute to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, earlier today I sent a "Dear Colleague" letter to all Members of the Senate which disclosed that elections will be held between December 4 and December 6 in Rhodesia. This announcement was made by Mr. Rowan Cronje and Mr. Gibson Magaramombe, cochairmen of Rhodesia's Ministerial Committee. It is clear that the Rhodesians are doing everything possible to fulfill their promises. They need and deserve for the sanctions to be lifted. I ask unanimous consent that that letter be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

DEAR COLLEAGUE: Mr. Rowan Cronje and Mr. Gibson Magaramombe, the co-chairmen of Rhodesia's Ministerial Committee on Electoral Process, today laid out a program for Rhodesian elections on the basis of one-person-one-vote.

Elections will be held between December 4 and December 6.

The Co-chairmen said that the Transitional Government hopes that the United Nations, the Organization of African Unity and "indeed any organization from any country" will send observers to the elections. Observers would be given a completely free hand and allowed to go where they liked. They said the Transitional Government was determined to show the election was free, fair and impartial.

Sincerely,

JESSE HELMS.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I continue to yield such time as I may require.

I believe, Mr. President, that the argument that has gone on this afternoon sufficiently deals with this proposal. It is perfectly possible to imagine an infinite variety of different ways of handling this situation. I think this is not sufficiently different from the Helms proposal to warrant any extended debate on it. In effect, as I understand it, it would give the people of Rhodesia and the present government a little peek at the promise land in the hope that they would be so enchanted by it, perhaps, that they would be quicker to embrace the provisions and fulfill the conditions which would result in a longer lifting of the embargo and perhaps its permanent lifting.

I think we have dealt with this question, Mr. President. I do not believe that this is sufficiently different from what we have already passed upon to warrant any extended discussion. I should be content to yield back the remainder of our time.

I understand the Senator's time has finished?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I move that the vote occur as stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield back his time?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN), and the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that if present and voting, the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN) and the Senators from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON and Mrs. HUMPHREY) would each vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 54, as follows:

So Mr. DANFORTH's amendment (UP No. 1507) was rejected.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CASE. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment in the nature of a substitute by the Senator from North Carolina (Mr. HELMS). The yeas and nays——

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May we have order in the Senate, please, so the Senator from North Carolina can be heard?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I think the Senate has expressed its will and, while I am disappointed that sanctions will not be lifted immediately, the Senate has spoken on the lifting of sanctions and endorsed the principles of the internal agreement and the transitional government. I see no purpose in further delaying the Senate on this question. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent to vitiate the order for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. HELMS. By unanimous consent, I may withdraw the amendment, is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Since there was a specific time limit on the amendment, it would require unanimous consent.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed to withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the amendment of the Senator from California, as amended.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, has all time been used up?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time has expired or been yielded back and the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be recognized after the disposition of this vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Senator from West Virginia will be recognized after the vote.

The question is on agreeing to UP amendment No. 1504, as amended, of the Senator from California (Mr. HAYAKAWA). The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON) and the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) would each vote "yea."

So Mr. HAYAKAWA's amendment (No. 1504), as amended, was agreed to.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, before I yield back my time, I ask unanimous consent that the record reflect to show that I voted "yea" on the Hayakawa amendment, as amended, and not "nay."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The foregoing rollcall vote has been adjusted to reflect the above order.)

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. METZENBAUM). Under the previous order, the majority leader is now recognized.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask that Mr. KENNEDY be recognized to call up an amendment, and then I will ask him to yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1508

(Purpose: To require reports concerning certain bank loans)

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, and ask the clerk to withhold consideration of it so I may yield to the majority leader.

I so yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENTS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask whether or not it will be possible to reduce the time on this amendment, which I ask Mr. KENNEDY and the managers of the bill. Will it be agreeable?

Mr. KENNEDY. Certainly, as far as I am concerned. This amendment will be for myself and Senator CHURCH, Senator CRANSTON, and Senator SARBANES. I think we could present our position in maybe 15 minutes, a half-hour evenly divided.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. So the time is an hour, if it could be reduced to 30 minutes. Mr. KENNEDY has suggested 30 minutes equally divided.

Is that agreeable with the managers?

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. CASE. That is agreeable.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The managers have indicated it is agreeable to them, so I make that unanimous-consent request

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will continue to yield, without the time being charged against him, there is an amendment by Mr. SCHMITT. Is it possible that we might be able to reduce the time on that amendment also?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am sure it is. The amendment will probably be satisfied by discussion, and that is being worked out now. At the appropriate time we can most certainly reduce the time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is the Senator saying it will not be possible at this point to reduce the time?

Mr. SCHMITT. We have not completed our discussion with committee staff. I should be able to give the Senator that kind of agreement, though, within the near future.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. All right.

Does the Senator have an idea how long it may take on his amendment once it is called up?

Mr. SCHMITT. I have a suspicion that a half hour will be more than adequate. Again, I reserve final decision until the committee has responded.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the Senator.

Does Mr. STEVENSON have an amendment he is going to call up?

Does Mr. ROTH have an amendment he is going to call up?

Mr. ROTH. Yes, I have an amendment.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. ROTH has an amendment. Is there a possibility of reducing the time on his amendment? It is now, I believe, 1 hour under the agreement. Can it be reduced?

Mr. ROTH. I am happy to reduce that 30 minutes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Is that agreeable?

Mr. JAVITS. Let us see what it is.

Mr. CASE. Yes. It is the report on the Soviet Union.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. The managers indicate that is agreeable.

I ask unanimous consent that the time on Mr. ROTH's amendment be reduced to one-half hour to be equally divided in accordance with the usual form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I understand that after Mr. KENNEDY's amendment Mr. PERCY will be ready to call up his amendment. There is at present a 2-hour limitation on that amendment which has been reduced from 4 hours. So, the Senate will be in a while. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. KENNEDY. Yes.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Gene Iwanciw of my staff have the privileges of the floor during the remainder of the debate on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LUGAR. I ask unanimous consent that Mark Lubbers of my staff have the privileges of the floor; and that Charles Morrison of the staff of Senator ROTH have similar privileges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The clerk has not reported the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. KENNEDY), for himself, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CRANSTON, and Mr. SARBANES proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1580.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

REPORTING REQUIREMENT

SEC. 26. (a) The Secretary of the Treasury shall prepare and transmit to the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House of Representatives, Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and House International Relations Committee, and the Chairman of the Senate Banking, Housing and Urban Affairs and House Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs Committee—

(1) Not later than June 1 of each year, a report containing the total value of both commitments to advance loans and loans advanced (including letters of credit, trade credits short and long term loans) by domestic banks during the six-month period ending December 31 of the preceding year, and the names of all domestic banks participating in such loans, and

(2) Not later than December 1 of each year, a report containing the total value of loans both commitments to advance loans and loans advanced (including letters of credit, trade credits, short and long term loans) by domestic banks during the six-month period ending on June 30 of such year, and the names of all domestic banks participating in such loans, to the government, all government agencies, entities or government-owned or controlled enterprises in each country, the name of which is on a list provided by the Secretary of State under Subsection (c)(1) and covering the six-month period of such report.

(b) The Secretary is authorized and directed to obtain from the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System, the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and the Comptroller of the Currency information necessary to enable him to carry out this section. Upon request of the Secretary, the head of each such agency shall furnish such information to the Secretary.

(c)(1) The Secretary of State shall provide to the Secretary a list of countries to which economic or security assistance has been reduced or denied by the United States during the period covered by the next report to be transmitted under subsection (a) primarily because the governments of such countries engaged in gross violations of internationally recognized human rights. For purposes of this paragraph, the term "gross violations of internationally recognized human rights" shall have the same meaning as under section 502B(d)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

(2) Not later than December 15 and June 15 of each year, the Secretary shall notify all domestic banks lending to such countries of the names of the countries on such list.

(d) The Secretary may prescribe regulations to carry out the provisions of this section.

(e) For purposes of this section, the term—

(1) "domestic bank" means any bank the deposits or accounts of which are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, and any branches and subsidiaries of such bank and provided that such bank has at least one foreign branch and at least $20 million in total claims on foreign residents; and

(2) "Secretary" refers to the Secretary of the Treasury, except where otherwise indicated.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "Sec. 26." and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 27."

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

I offer this amendment on behalf of myself, the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the Senator from California (Mr. CRANSTON), and the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES).

Mr. President, this amendment is a rather simple amendment, but even though it is simple, it is extremely important in the whole area of human rights.

Basically, under the current situation the Comptroller of the Currency has available to him the amounts of loans that are going from private banks in this country to governments all over the world. The Secretary of State has available to him where there have been findings of violations of human rights, so this information is available within both the Treasury Department and the State Department.

This particular amendment would make such information available to the Congress which, at the present time, does not have specific information on the particular banks and the amount of loans to human rights violators——although obviously we have information on where there have been terminations of economic and security assistance.

Over the period of recent years, the Congress has taken action to terminate military assistance to Chile. It has also made a finding about the violations of human rights in Chile, and we have terminated economic aid to Chile.

However, we have also seen over just 1 year a 500-percent increase in the amount of loans by American banks to the Chilean Government. So, on the one hand, we see aid reductions on the basis of a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights, reductions mandated by the people's representative in the Congress of the United States. On the other hand, we see an explosion of loans to the Chilean Government and other human rights violators.

What we are trying to do with this amendment is to make this information available to the Congress of the United States: the aggregate number of loans by country and also the banks which are involved in making those loans.

What we do not ask for in this amendment, although I think it is desirable, is to know how much is being loaned by each bank to human rights violators. I had initially favored a proposal that would have made available to the appropriate committees in the House and in the Senate, which would be the Banking Committee and the Foreign Relations Committee, the names of the banks and the amount of their loans. These committees, acting as the instruments of the House and of the Senate, would be able to use that particular information in the formulation and development of the foreign policy of this country. But this amendment only seeks the aggregate amounts and the names of the banks.

The question has been raised whether a particular bank doing business over a long period of time with a particular country, in which there is a revolution in that country and the new leaders violate human rights, would be adversely affected by this amendment. The answer is no, it would not. The amendment is drafted in such a way that the information disclosed would be on the basis of new commitments following aid cutbacks based on serious violations of human rights.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is important information that ought to be available to the House and to the Senate. It does not prejudge what actions would be taken by the House and the Senate. But I do believe that if the Congress has limited economic or security assistance, it should know whether that particular decision is being undermined by the explosion of lending by banks, which may be against our national interest.

That is really the purpose and spirit of this amendment, and it is the reason why the Senator from Idaho, the Senator from California, and the Senator from Maryland have joined me in offering it.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the full text of my prepared remarks be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the remarks were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMERCIAL BANK DISCLOSURE

The purpose and effect of this amendment are really very simple and very modest. It will simply require that the Secretary of the Treasury keep the Congress informed of the total value of loans granted by private banks, and the names of those banks, to countries whose economic or military assistance has been terminated or reduced for human rights reasons.

The banks already report this information to the executive branch and will not be subject to additional paperwork or reporting requirements. This amendment simply requires the Secretary of the Treasury to report it, in aggregate form by country, to the Congress.

It does not require disclosure of bank loans to private recipients—only to governments and government-owned or controlled corporations, at the Federal, State or municipal levels.

Nor does this amendment in any way prevent or hinder the extension of commercial credits to any country, but simply gives the Congress the means to determine whether the banks are filling the financial gap created by our limitation of official aid for human rights reasons.

Up to the present time, recipients of U.S. aid have had their assistance terminated or limited because of violations of human rights. United States policy on human rights has already made important progress, particularly in Latin America, and will make more progress as it is pursued seriously, consistently, and with due regard for the special factors of a given relationship.

There exists the possibility, however, that this policy is being undercut by American dollars. For according to the few figures available to the Congress, there are countries in which outgoing American private capital may more than offset the funding lost through administration or congressional terminations or cut-backs.

Chile, widely regarded as a key test of our human rights policy in Latin America, presents an important example. It is a country where a long-standing democracy was forcibly overthrown, and where a dictatorial junta has maintained its rule through mass jailings, political "disappearances" and even the arrangement of political assassination within the United States.

In response to violations of human rights and an end to democracy in Chile, all United States assistance to the Pinochet government has ended.

Yet, while United States economic and military assistance between 1975 and 1977 has been cut back for a net loss of $63 million per year, during the same period private lending has expanded by more than 500 percent to $520 million, thereby more than replacing reductions authorized by the Congress and the administration. And the flow of private capital to Chile is rapidly swelling, with commercial credits for 1977 totaling $858 million, and with 1978 credits expected to exceed $1 billion.

I do not believe that the Congress should make a substantive judgment now on private lending to any particular country. Many loans are of direct benefit to masses of poor people in these countries. Some may be essential to the economic development that will break the poverty cycle.

It may well be that a proposed cut-back of official U.S. aid will be foregone because it will be seen to be ineffectual in the face of extensive private loans.

On the other hand, other loans may instead perpetuate dictatorial and repressive regimes. It would be tragic if private lending would associate the United States with repressive regimes, in those cases which the Congress or the administration have disassociated us by reducing or ending our assistance to those regimes. The fact remains that the Congress simply does not have the access to all the information it needs and deserves to answer this question.

The amendment I am proposing today will remedy this problem.

In essence, we are directing the transmittal of data already held in large part by Federal agencies to the Congress so that we may assess the full U.S. role in countries that violate human rights.

The disclosure requirement will apply only to countries that have already had their assistance reduced or terminated. Thus it is the congress and the administration who have already determined which countries are violators for the purposes of disclosure.

Once again, this amendment in no way affects existing or future loans to any country. It does not require the disclosure of specific bank loans or terms that may be sensitive from the competitive viewpoint. It only gives the congress the basic facts—the total amount by country and the names of the banks—relevant to an assessment of their impact on our foreign policy.

The bottom line is very simple. In some cases, our foreign aid policies may be undermined. The congress and the administration should have the ability to make findings of such fundamental importance to our foreign policy objectives.

Mr. KENNEDY. I withhold the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota is recognized.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes.

First of all, I commend the Senator from Massachusetts for his continued efforts in the field on human rights, and for speaking out consistently and forcefully, as he has, on this issue.

Acting for the chairman of the committee, the distinguished Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN), who is a member of the Banking Committee and the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the two committees that would have jurisdiction over the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, I would simply like to say that while I endorse the thrust of the Senator's amendment, and I am sure that is true with other members of the committee, including the chairman, we are not familiar with all the implications that the amendment might raise.

However, I have been instructed by the chairman to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that the Banking Committee and the Committee on Foreign Relations will move to look into this matter very quickly and to review thoroughly the implications of the Senator's amendment.

Under those circumstances, I would hope that perhaps the Senator would withdraw his amendment now, with the assurance that it will get serious committee attention in the very near future.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. McGOVERN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. KENNEDY. In addition to the particular amendment, would the Senator look into the other points which have been raised in my earlier comments about the advisability of making available the exact numbers to the appropriate committees? There are several alternatives we have discussed here. One is to make the aggregate loan amounts and the names of the banks available to Congress: A second alternative is to give the loans per bank to Congress or to the appropriate committees of Congress, possibly on a confidential basis, to be used for foreign policy considerations and judgments.

The second alternative, I think, is actually the preferable one. The amendment we have proposed today is basically more of a compromise, although it would still be enormously useful and valuable. I am just wondering whether the committee would consider these items as well in its review?

Mr. McGOVERN. I will say to the Senator that all of these questions he has raised are reasonable, and I personally am in full sympathy with what he is trying to do. I think I can give him assurance that, while Senator SPARKMAN is not on the floor at the moment, there is no question that the committee will go into these various things he has raised here on the floor today.

I see the Senator from Idaho here.

Mr. KENNEDY. Just a final point on this and then I will yield.

Would the Senator also give consideration, in addition to the bank-to-government situation, to disclosure of bank loans to private companies or individuals as well?

Mr. McGOVERN. Absolutely. Absolutely.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. First, I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. CHURCH. I thank the Senator very much.

First of all, let me say I am proud of the amendment. I am one of the cosponsors. I recognize the sensitivity involved when information is sought concerning private bank loans. I remember that 2 years ago the Foreign Relations Subcommittee on Multinational Corporations was very much concerned about the amount of Arab money that might be coming into American banks on short-term deposits, then lent in a long-term fashion to other foreign governments, and the possible instability that this might pose.

When we sought the information from the banks, we were unsuccessful in getting it because of the concerns about confidentiality and the resistance of the Federal Reserve Bank to the disclosure of such information without elaborate precautions being taken. It took us some time to work out a special arrangement with the Federal Reserve Bank in order to obtain the information in an aggregate form, which would protect the individual banks and also not cause a run on a given bank, which might have been possible.

For these reasons, it might be well for this amendment to be considered more carefully by the Foreign Relations Committee, and I would have to acknowledge that the Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs Committee might have a jurisdictional claim that needs to be explored.

But if we do not press the amendment at this time, then I would hope that the Foreign Relations Committee would take up the matter, and confer with the chairman of the Banking Committee. I have privately talked to him and he assures me that he is fully sympathetic with the objective sought in this case, but he would like to have a look at the particulars as well.

I think this would not occasion undue delay, but would constitute the more responsible way to proceed. For that reason, if we can have such assurances, I would recommend to the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts that we proceed in that fashion.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes, I am happy to yield.

Mr. HEINZ. If I correctly understand the amendment, which deals with banks, I would agree with the Senator's assertion that there are jurisdictional questions touching on the Banking Committee.

But going beyond that for the moment, would it be a logical extension of the intention of the authors of this amendment that, beyond seeking to develop a reporting system involving the banks and countries which might have human rights shortcomings, the Senator from Idaho or the Senator from Massachusetts would also want to apply the same logic to grain exports by the Commodity Credit Corporation? Would that also be a similar kind of objective that would be consonant with the ones stated here?

Mr. CHURCH. I do not think there is any particular problem involving grain exports and the Commodity Credit Corporation. But information relating to the extent of private bank loans to the Chilean Government, for example, is not readily available to Congress, nor to either committee charged by Congress with the primary responsibility in the field of foreign relations.

We have a foreign policy objective of either cutting back or eliminating entirely economic and military aid from the United States to a government that we feel is engaged in gross violations of human rights. If this is a valid policy, and I think it is, then it follows that Congress should at least be informed as to whether any gap created by our own refusal to extend public aid is being filled by private credit from American banks, thus circumventing the national policy.

Mr. HEINZ. From my point of view, what about private credit supplied by an exporter directly?

Mr. CHURCH. What we are seeking here is information that has to do with private bank loans to foreign governments that we have found to be engaged in a gross and systematic denial of human rights, not private credit extended to foreign companies.

Having cut off official governmental aid to a particular foreign government, we would like to know whether or not private banks merely step in, fill the gap, and furnish the government with the very credit that has officially been withheld.

Mr. HEINZ. I thank the Senator for yielding. I think our colloquy perhaps demonstrates the need for additional study of these issues.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on the time of the opposition?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I hope very much that Senator KENNEDY and his associates will do what seems indicated now. It is a very dangerous matter, involving a possible run on the banks, as the Senator himself has indicated. I would like to put into the RECORD, in addition, a colloquy between the President of the United States and a questioner at a press conference which he held in Brasilia on March 30 last.

Will the Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) yield me 2 minutes from the time in opposition for this purpose?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

Mr. JAVITS. The colloquy is as follows. The questioner asked:

> The American commercial banks are the main Brazilian source of external credit. It seems to some people in Washington that sooner or later a Congressman may try to establish a link between the commercial banking loans and the human rights policy. I'd like to know your opinion about this subject.

The President answered:

> Brazil is a major trading partner of the United States in commercial goods and also in loans and, I might say, timely repayments. The debt of Brazil is very manageable. The loans of the American banks to Brazil are sound. Additional loans are being pursued by the American banks as an excellent advantage for their future investments in Brazil, based on the strength of your country. It would be inconceivable to me that any act of Congress would try to restrict the lending of money by American private banks to Brazil under any circumstances. This would violate the principles of our own free enterprise system, and if such an act was passed by Congress, I would not approve it.

Mr. President, that does not bind us yes or no, but I think it should weigh in the consideration of the opponents as to any suggestion about restricting any loans.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, let me respond by saying, as the Senator from New York knows, this amendment does not propose a restriction of any kind upon private bank lending. It seeks only to inform Congress as to the extent of private bank lending to a foreign government which has been cut off from official aid by reason of gross denial of human rights.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would like to add here that, of course, our amendment also provides the stockholders of the banks concerned the kind of information which is certainly of assistance to the free enterprise system.

Mr. CHURCH. Let me say that when we encountered this problem before, at the time my subcommittee was attempting to obtain information relating to Arab deposits in American banks, we did find a way to solve it, a way that protected against all of these concerns. With the cooperation of the Federal Reserve Bank, we obtained the necessary information in a form that was acceptable to the individual banks and acceptable to the Federal Reserve Bank. I think if the two committees address the question they can find an acceptable method for securing the information in this case.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator yield for a statement?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield the floor.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield 5 minutes?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey only has time on the bill.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I control the time on this side. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator from South Dakota.

Let me first declare which will be obvious, my interest in this matter. A very large number of the banks which would be affected by this amendment are New York banks. They are, in a sense, my banks, as I represent New York.

Mr. President. I would have to say that it was a not altogether agreeable surprise to learn that this matter was to be proposed: without hearings, without consultation with the committees directly affected. The Senator from South Dakota has suggested the Finance Committee might have jurisdiction. I believe it does. As a member of the Finance Committee I certainly would want to have this matter before us.

Mr. President, I would hope no one would question, I know few would even presume to doubt, the complete and honorable and effective commitment to human rights of the sponsors of this amendment. Yet I would like to suggest that they are of course, not alone. They would not suggest otherwise. I speak as someone who was a member of the platform drafting committee of my party, who drafted the human rights amendments on which our candidate for President ran, which our party stood for, and which the present administration seeks to carry out.

Mr. President, I find this an alarmingly statist proposal, an alarming illiberal proposal. If there is one disease of the modern age, and it is virulent in this Nation, it is the proposition that all institutions have to be miniatures of the polity; that they have to reflect the composition of a polity, and have to assume the purposes of the polity. There could not be a more profoundly illiberal idea; the idea that private persons and private institutions must behave as the State behaves.

Should we enact a measure such as this, when will we wish to know from the universities what research they are doing and where and by whom? When will we next wish to know who is traveling for tourist purposes, where, when, and with what sources of funds?

The policies of the U.S. Government do not determine the choice of individual American persons, be they individuals or corporate persons.

The idea that the purposes of the state are the primary purposes of the whole of society is profoundly dangerous and is pervasive.

Mr. President, I offer one other thought, not in any sense meant to denigrate the purposes of this amendment. I wish to say there are often somehow hidden agendas in these affairs. We have heard twice on the floor today the instance of Chile. Well, Chile assuredly does no great credit to the democratic traditions of the Western Hemisphere at this moment. We hear General Pinochet may be on his way out and good riddance. At the United Nations and elsewhere I have arrayed myself as much against that brutal regime as anyone. I do not at all question that we should talk about Chile.

But why do we never talk about Afghanistan? Mr. Allende was murdered, brutally, and some persons with him. In Afghanistan 5,000 persons, every member of Daoud's family to the lateral three generations have been slaughtered. We never hear about Afghanistan. Is it because it was succeeded by a government of the totalitarian left as against a government of the authoritarian right?

We hear so much about the inequities of governments of the right when they abuse the responsibilities of statehood. When have we heard a word in this Chamber about the butchering of the Lebanese democracy by clients of the Soviet Union?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 5 minutes have expired.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator's remarks are completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield for a question?

Mr. KENNEDY. As indicated earlier in the exchange with the Senator from South Dakota and with the Senator from Idaho, we are prepared to withdraw the amendment, on the assurances that we have received from the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee and the chairman of the Banking Committee that their committees would review our proposals and the alternatives fully and sympathetically. At this time, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is withdrawn.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I would like to say to the Senator from Massachusetts and to the Senator from Idaho that I shall be very glad, as far as I can as chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, to see that adequate attention is given to both matters. I believe we can work out something.

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the chairman, and I appreciate his assurances. I look forward to working with the Foreign Relations Committee in this matter.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am sure the Senator from Idaho, who will be in the Foreign Relations Committee on that occasion, will be quite capable of taking care of the matter there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1509

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress that the President should review United States-Soviet relations.)

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I send to the desk my unprinted amendment and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Delaware (Mr. ROTH) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1509.

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

SEC. 26. (a) The Congress finds and declares that a sound and stable relationship with the Soviet Union will help achieve the objectives of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, strengthen the security of the United States, and improve the prospects for world peace.

(b) Therefore, it is the sense of the Congress that the President, in cooperation with the Congress and knowledgeable members of the public, should make a full review of United States policy towards the Soviet Union and report to the Congress. Such review should cover, but not be limited to—

(1) an over-all reevaluation of objectives and priorities of the United States in relations with the Soviet Union;

(2) the evolution of and sources of all bargaining power of the United States with the Soviet Union and how such bargaining power might be enhanced;

(3) what linkages do exist and should or should not exist between various elements of United States-Soviet relations such as arms control negotiations, human rights issues, and economic and cultural exchanges;

(4) the policies of the United States toward human rights conditions in the Soviet Union and how improved Soviet respect for human rights might be more effectively achieved;

(5) the current status of strategic arms limitations talks and whether such talks should be continued in their present framework or terminated and renewed in some other forum;

(6) the current status of other arms control negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union;

(7) the challenges posed by Soviet and Cuban involvement in developing countries and a study of appropriate policy responses and instruments to meet such challenges more effectively;

(8) the impact of the relations of the United States with the People's Republic of China on relations with the Soviet Union;

(9) the impact of strategic parity on the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union and the ability of the United States to meet its obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty;

(10) the identification of economic, technological, scientific, and cultural relations with the Soviet Union and whether such relations are desirable and should be continued expanded, restricted, or linked to other aspects of the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union;

(11) the evolution of Soviet domestic politics and the relationship between domestic politics and foreign policy behavior, especially towards the United States; and

(12) what improvements should be made in the institutions and procedures of United States foreign policy in order to ensure a coherent and effective policy towards the Soviet Union.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "Sec. 26." and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 27.".

Mr. ROTH. Mr. President, this amendment urges the President, in cooperation with Congress and nongovernmental experts, to make a full-scale review of American-Soviet relations and report. I believe a reassessment of our relationship is very much needed—needed to give a signal to the Soviet Union, needed to develop a coherent, consistent, and effective American policy toward the other superpower, and needed to help provide a better understanding of some important shifts in the nature of the Soviet challenge. I believe a report will provide a clear, public statement of our policy.

I am certain there is no Member in this Chamber nor any informed American citizen who is not deeply concerned by the present state of our relations with the Soviet Union. We are witnessing harassment and intimidation of American newsmen, businessmen, and even diplomats in Moscow.

We are seeing massive Soviet intervention, through Cuban mercenaries, in Africa. There is a new wave of Soviet repression, unprecedented since Stalin's time, against dissidents and against those who wish to emigrate. We have been unable so far to secure an acceptable SALT II arms control agreement. For these reasons, a reappraisal of our policy toward the Soviet Union is very timely.

It would send an important signal to the Soviet Union that the United States is seriously concerned about recent Soviet behavior, so seriously concerned that we find it necessary to review the basic premises on which past policies were constructed.

A review is desperately needed to help develop a sound and consistent American policy—one understandable to the Soviets, understandable to our allies, and, most importantly, acceptable and understandable to the American people. The President has spoken very eloquently in the past on the need for broad public support as the basis for an effective foreign policy. Today, our foreign policies, especially our policies toward the Soviet Union, enjoy neither the support of our people nor the confidence of our friends, nor the respect of our adversaries and competitors.

It is very clear that our Soviet policies are not working. We are at a crucial juncture in our relations with the Soviet Union. The rapid deterioration of relations over the past few months threatens a full-scale return of the cold war. Part of the reason for the present problems, I am convinced, lies in a failure of the United States to set realistic priorities in its Soviet policies and to speak firmly, consistently, and with a single voice. A review of our policies, in which the Congress and private experts participate, should help develop the kind of consensus on our priorities and the means of implementing them that is now so much needed. A report will help make our policies understandable to the public.

I also believe the review called for in this amendment is needed to develop appropriate strategies to deal with new dimensions to the Soviet challenge. In contrast to the past, the Soviet Union is able to project conventional military power, either directly or through Cuban mercenaries, into the developing world. As we have seen in Africa, it is also willing to do so. The United States has not yet found an effective response to Soviet adventurism in Africa. Can we deal with it by applying pressure in Moscow, or is the only effective means of dealing with it in the developing countries themselves? This should be carefully assessed.

In contrast to a decade ago, there is now strategic parity between the United States and the Soviet Union, and many experts believe the U.S.S.R. will be clearly ahead in the next decade. In the past, the United States has relied in part on its strategic superiority to help counterbalance Soviet conventional superiority in Europe. The impact of strategic parity and possible further worsening of the strategic balance on our ability to met our treaty obligations in Western Europe, therefore, also needs careful assessment.

The amendment also specifies numerous other aspects of our Soviet policies that are much disputed and require careful study and clarification. For example, on the issues of linkages, we find one major administration official has one position, and another has another position. On the question of bargaining leverage, there appears to be a fairly substantial number who believe that the expansion of economic and cultural ties have strengthened our bargaining power, but some experts believe American leverage has been substantially reduced by shifts in the military balance. We need a careful assessment of what bargaining levers we have, how to make the best use of them, and how to strengthen our bargaining position.

On the question of human rights, there has been a great deal of rhetoric, but the situation of dissidents in the Soviet Union has worsened rather than improved. We should be examining alternative approaches in this area.

There are a host of questions relating to the SALT negotiations. Should they be explicitly linked to other aspects of American-Soviet relations or should they stand apart? Can the present negotiations lead to a beneficial, verifiable, and genuinely significant SALT agreement, or have we locked ourselves into a framework from which little useful can possibly emerge? Is there an alternative approach to help assure a mutually beneficial result?

There is also the controversial question of "the China card." Is there a China card, and if there is one, how can it be best developed and used?

What is of most concern to me is that although we have many specialists on Soviet affairs in the Department of State, Department of Defense, and other agencies, no clear and definable strategy has emerged for dealing effectively with the many important issues in American-Soviet relations. The painstaking steps made over the past few years to try to establish a sound basis for American-Soviet relations appear to be fast crumbling. Soviet adventurism abroad and suppression at home are increasing. The American people, according to recent polls, are rightly deeply distrustful of the Soviet Union. They rightly believe the United States must pursue a firm, tough policy toward the Soviet Union. They also are very hopeful that some sound and constructive arms control agreements can emerge from SALT that will be in the interests of both powers.

Mr. President, I believe the review and report contemplated in this amendment would provide an opportunity to develop a sound policy reflecting the desires and good sense of the American people. It will provide an opportunity to make a clear, firm statement of our interests to the Soviet Union. I very much hope the amendment will be enacted and the President will proceed with the kind of review contemplated.

I yield back the floor.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I listened with great interest to the presentation by the author of this amendment. I have looked over the amendment. I think his suggestions in his presentation were very good. I think the amendment is good. For my part, I am willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes, indeed.

Mr. CASE. I think the chairman has been very right and wise. I concur in the action. We heartily congratulate the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. ROTH. I thank both the chairman and the ranking member of the committee for accepting the amendment and for their interest and support.

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I say this is consistent with the Foreign Relations Committee's own determination when we instructed our professional staff to conduct a detailed study of United States-Soviet relations. I am very glad to accept the amendment.

Mr. ROTH. My understanding is that the Foreign Relations Committee is making a careful review. I hope that the administration, the President and his key advisers, will work with the Foreign Relations Committee, as well as the other committees who have jurisdiction, in bringing about the results contemplated by the study.

I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROTH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, earlier the Senator from Virginia asked about the $80 million authorization for the southern African special requirements fund in fiscal year 1978. That total was not intended to be a limit on total economic assistance to southern Africa. It was an earmark, not a ceiling. In addition, the total 1978 authorization for security supporting assistance of $1,830,000,000 includes $35 million for specific country programs in southern Africa. The total country allocation for the fiscal year 1978 has been placed in the RECORD.

It is true that of the $80 million earmarked for the southern Africa special requirements fund, only about $42 million had been obligated by May. I would note that the fiscal year is not yet over.

The Senator also asked for lists which include the projects in the special requirements fund. I submit those lists for fiscal year 1978 for the RECORD.

UP AMENDMENT 1510

(Purpose: Strike $40,000,000 for southern Africa (40 million))

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.), on behalf of himself, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. RANDOLPH, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1510.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 10, line 22, strike "$110,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$70,000,000."

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, under the bill as it came to the Senate, the committee added $40 million for the southern African program. This $40 million was not sought by the administration. It is $40 million over the amount requested by the administration for these activities. It seems to me it is very unwise to increase these amounts over and above what the President requested.

One reason I am presenting this amendment, yesterday, the Carter administration urged Congress to cut $5 billion from the upcoming budget. That is the budget that Congress is now working on.

This proposal presented to the Senate by the Foreign Relations Committee goes in the opposite direction. The committee increases the President's proposed budget and my amendment would reduce the amount for this southern African program from the $110 million in the bill to the $70 million recommended by the President.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, will the Senator give me his attention?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD. JR. Yes.

Mr. CASE. We have already dealt with the question of earmarking $20 million for Rhodesia. This was done without a record vote.

I also think it was on the general understanding that the amount in question was going to stay as the committee put it in.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. There was no such understanding on the part of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from New Jersey might have had that understanding.

Mr. CASE. The Senator from New Jersey had that understanding. He certainly does not question the Senator from Virginia's statement that he did not understand it.

But I will certainly urge my colleague not to accept the amendment of the Senator from Virginia because the action we have taken already as a body is predicated upon the larger amount.

I hope that there will be no real difficulty in defeating the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. There will not be, because this body likes to vote more and more funds.

If the Senate is determined to further increase the President's recommendations, it has got the right to do it. But, somehow or another, we are going to have to get some spending under control and we cannot get it under control by increasing an already swollen budget.

I would hope the Senate would approve this. I would hope the committee would accept this.

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. SPARKMAN. As it stands, is it a question of earmarking, or not?

In other words, is it not the understanding that the $20 million is the amount that will be used?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. The Senator from Virginia's amendment proposes to reduce the total amount from $110 million to $70 million for this particular budget item.

Mr. SPARKMAN. But as it stands now, is it not a fund that is more or less earmarked?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I did not understand it that way. But if the Senator from Alabama, the manager of the bill, understands it that way and if he wishes to reduce the total amount by $20 million, I would take that under consideration.

But I think the entire $40 million should be cut out.

Mr. CASE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Yes.

Mr. CASE. My understanding—I had not quite understood the exact purport of the amendment until now—is that the total figure authorized is not being changed or reduced?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. At the moment, but if this carries, it will be.

Mr. CASE. Does the Senator mean he will follow with another amendment to do that?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Let me put it this way. The first amendment that I drew and had planned to submit at this point was in two parts. It changed the total figure by $40 million and changed this item figure by $40 million.

Mr. CASE. Changed the earmarking figure?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Changed the earmarking figure, yes.

Mr. CASE. And the total, as well?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. And the total, as well.

Mr. CASE. But the Senator has only offered one now?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I have only offered one now because the other would have been subject to a point of order in that it amended two parts of the bill in one amendment which cannot be done.

So if the Senate were to approve this, then the logical thing for the Senate to do, and I assume it would if it approves this, is to approve this other amendment which would reduce the total figure.

Mr. CASE. Would the Senator think it out of order to ask unanimous consent to do the whole thing in one amendment so we can defeat it in one amendment?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I would be delighted to have one amendment.

Mr. CASE. What does the chairman think?

Mr. SPARKMAN. It is agreeable to me.

Mr. CASE. Dispose of it in one motion.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I think that would be desirable.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that may be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAVEL). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CASE. Will the Senator do it and then we can go to work on it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Would the Senator send the modification to the desk?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, I send another amendment to the desk and ask that the two be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, they will be considered en bloc.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 10, line 22, strike "$110,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$70,000,000."

On page 7, line 13, strike "$1,972,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,932,000,000."

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I say again, what this does is to reduce the amount to the amount requested by the President. It cuts out the $40 million added by the committee. That is all it does.

Mr. CASE. That is now before us?

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. That is right.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I do not believe we need to argue it more.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CASE. On behalf of the chairman, I yield back our time.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to UP amendment No. 1510 of the Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.). The yeas and nays have been ordered and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), and the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON) is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 69, nays 25, as follows:

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1511

(Purpose: Amend Export Administration Act to control certain exports of crime control and detection instruments and equipment)

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk, and ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course, I yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Will the Senator be willing to reduce the time on this amendment?

Mr. STEVENSON. This amendment should not take more than 30 seconds.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Fine.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator.

ORDER THAT ROLLCALL VOTES BE OF 10-MINUTE DURATION

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that after the next rollcall vote, any rollcall votes after the next rollcall vote be 10-minute rollcall votes for the rest of the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1511:

Strike out section 22 of S. 3075 and insert at the end of the bill the following new section:

Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(n)(1) Crime control and detection instruments and equipment shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.

"(2) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or to Japan, Australia, or New Zealand."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the bill contains a provision which affects export controls administered pursuant to the Export Administration Act, a matter within the jurisdiction of the Banking Committee. Rather than hold up floor consideration of the bill while it is referred to the Banking Committee for the purpose of reviewing the provision in question, section 222 of S. 3075, I have prepared an amendment which I understand is acceptable to the members of the Foreign Relations Committee who sponsored section 22.

The amendment would replace section 22 of the bill. Section 22 would place crime control and detection instruments and equipment on the munitions list administered by the Department of State under the Arms Export Control Act and require quarterly reports on sales of such items to foreign police or intelligence services. The provision was prompted by concern that crime control equipment made in this country was readily available for purchase by police and internal security forces in foreign countries with records of torture and abuse of prisoners and repression of human rights. Such items could be exported under a general license issued by the Department of Commerce pursuant to the Export Administration Act, except to Communist country destinations. Exports of such items to Communist countries require a validated license.

The validated license procedure provides an opportunity for the executive branch to review the facts in each case and determine whether the proposed export is in the national interest. The Department of State and Defense may review export applications to determine consistency with our national security and foreign policy, including human rights considerations.

The amendment would extend the validated license requirement for the export of crime control and detection instruments and equipment to exports of such items to all destinations except NATO countries, Japan, Australia, or New Zealand. Applications to export such items to countries where police or internal security forces engage in a consistent pattern of gross violations of human rights would be closely scrutinized. The reporting requirement in section 22 of the bill would be deleted; instead the Department of Commerce will include in its semi-annual reports to Congress on export controls information on validated licenses issued and applications to export crime control and detection instruments and equipment.

The Department of Commerce has already acted to extend validated license control for such exports to all countries except the NATO countries, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand. The amendment to S. 3075 will amend the Export Administration Act to make the validated license requirement statutory rather than subject to administrative discretion.

The amendment adds a new subsection to the Export Administration Act, which is the basic export control statute and will be subject to reconsideration and extension next year.

Mr. President, this is a technical amendment. The bill in section 22 places exports of crime control equipment on the munitions list administered by the Department of State. This amendment would extend the validated license requirement for the export of crime control and detection instruments and equipment to exports of such use to all destinations except the NATO countries, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand.

It replaces the munition list procedure for the validated license procedures under the Export Administration Act which is the proper, appropriate procedure.

I have discussed the amendment with the distinguished managers of the bill and know of no opposition to it and hope they will accept it.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, has the Senator concluded?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, except for unanimous consent request, that concludes it.

I hope, having discussed this with the managers of the bill, they will accept the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, let me say I have looked over this amendment.

Mr. President, the amendment offered by Senator STEVENSON retains the basic intent of section 22 of the committee bill. The intent of this provision was that crime control and detection equipment be reviewed as necessary by the Department of State from a human rights point of view. The amendment proposed by Senator STEVENSON would move crime control and detection equipment onto the Commerce Department's validated list and makes provision for the State Department review.

It is a good amendment. I am perfectly willing to accept it, and I am advised by Senator CASE that he also will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Do Senators yield back their time?

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back my time on the amendment.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHMITT. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1512

(Purpose: To strike extended review period from Act)

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I send an unprinted amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT) proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1512.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 30, beginning with line 1, strike out all through line 13 of page 30.

On page 30, line 15, strike out "Sec. 25.", and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 24.".

On page 31, line 6, strike out "Sec. 26.", and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 25.".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield?

Mr. SCHMITT. I am happy to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. President, it is my understanding that Mr. SCHMITT will not require long on this amendment. I hope Mr. BAKER will then be able to call up his amendment and that his amendment will be followed by Mr. PERCY's amendment.

It is our intention to stay in this evening and to finish the bill. Saying that, I hope Senators will reduce time on amendments where possible.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Amen.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, this amendment goes to the question of congressional modification of arms sales.

Mr. President, cooperation between the President and the Congress in the conduct of American foreign policy is essential for an effective foreign policy. I support the efforts of consultation and cooperation between these two branches of Government. In recent years, Congress has enacted legislation establishing procedures for this cooperation. These procedures, I believe, will remove some of the problems encountered in the past although occasionally we may have created others. It must, however, be remembered that the President is still primarily responsible for the conduct of the foreign policy of the United States. He must have some flexibility and Congress must take great care not to tie the President's hands with procedures that are too inflexible or cumbersome.

Congress has recognized that the sale of arms to other nations is an important part of our foreign policy. Under the provisions of the Arms Export Control Act, Congress has 30 days in which to consider a proposed arms sale. If Congress does not act within those 30 days, the arms sale may proceed.

It is the feeling of this Senator that this involvement by Congress has been constructive to date. It is also my feeling that the administration has cooperated with Congress in this issue.

The bill before us would amend section 36(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act to permit an additional 30 days for Congress to consider a proposed arms sale if the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or the House International Relations Committee votes by a two-thirds vote for such an extension.

Mr. President, this provision of S. 3075 may unnecessarily delay action on the arms sale. My amendment would strike this section of the bill.

The Senator from New Mexico does not completely understand the necessity of this provision. The Senate report accompanying the bill states:

The committee wishes to note the full cooperation it has received from the executive branch regarding advance consultation on arms sales. In adopting this section, the committee does not wish to indicate displeasure with executive branch performance on sales notifications.

Not only has the administration complied with the letter of this law, but it has complied with the spirit of the law. In addition to the 30 days required by law, Congress has been aware of every major arms sale, especially the controversial ones, for months before it has been officially submitted to the Congress. The committee does not point to any problems which could have prompted the adding of this provision to S. 3075.

I am certain that the administration has timetables which it is attempting to adhere to. To delay a final vote on an arms sale for an additional 30 days under the history of this provision of the Arms Export Control Act may be unreasonable. The fact is that this provision has been complied with. I am not sure there is reason to further complicate and prolong the procedure.

Let me state that in the future, should any administration attempt to circumvent the intent of this law, I would consider further restricting executive action. At this time, however, there seems to be no good reason to do so.

I would like to pose five questions to the distinguished members of the committee in the hope that in their answers then we can reach some accommodation on this issue.

My first question to the committee is what problems with regard to time, notification time, that is, have been encountered by the committee?

Mr. SPARKMAN. May I say, in answer to that question, that normally the 30-day review period provides adequate time to review an arms sale. Only in special cases is more time needed.

We have had three such cases. One of them was the sale of the AWACS to Iran, and another was the sale of F-15's to Saudi Arabia. And Hawk missiles. Sales to Jordan. Those are the only cases we have here. Ordinarily there is plenty of time to take care of the situation.

Mr. SCHMITT. Well, I presume that by the Senator's answer my second question is has the law or spirit of the law been circumvented in any of these cases?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The law has not been violated. The President first presents to us an informal notification. Then he follows that up with a formal notification and the law is set as to the time that can be used in the consideration of this, and we have had no trouble on that score.

Mr. SCHMITT. Following up on those answers, and then I will ask three more questions, is the problem that becomes awkward in the implementation of an arms sale when this delay occurs and the President must resubmit it in order to get another 30 days? Is that part of the reason for this provision to avoid that kind of awkard situation?

Mr. CASE. I think it is fair to say, if I may intervene, that is very much a part of the intent here. It would make it much easier, I think, to adjust the situations without a confrontation, and that is the hope of the Committee.

Mr. SCHMITT. The Committee then would not foresee, and certainly would not encourage, a delay between the consummation of the sale and notification of the committee. They are just trying to take care of those examples that, for some reason or other, tend to be more controversial; is that the case?

Mr. CASE. That is exactly right. In those cases this additional time can, I think, more easily be obtained than by use of the pressures that sometimes have to be exerted.

We think it is probably going to result in a smoother operation, and it will facilitate the relations between the executive branch and Congress in this matter.

Mr. SCHMITT. My third question would be, in order to set this record straight, what has been the average time period between the conclusion of an arms sale and its submission to Congress?

Mr. SPARKMAN. The time period varies, but usually an informal notification is sent to Congress 20 days before the formal notification is forwarded for our consideration.

Mr. SCHMITT. The fourth question is, Have the Senate and House committees been consulted during the negotiation process, as a rule?

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not sure I understand the impact of that question.

Mr. SCHMITT. Well, prior to the consummation of the sale, has the Senator's committee generally been consulted in a systematic way about the sale before it is necessary to act on it?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Does the Senator mean with reference to the notification?

Mr. SCHMITT. Yes, prior to notification has there been a spirit of consultation between the committee and the administration?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Yes. As I said a few minutes ago, the President sends us an informal notification. The time between his sending that and sending the formal notification, we work in the committee trying to find out just what the situation is. We have had no trouble on that except in a couple of instances which I mentioned.

Mr. SCHMITT. Is it clearly the intent of the committee chairman and the distinguished ranking member that the process would not be changed in any way, and that you would expect to have a timely alert to the impending formal notification and then a timely submission of the formal notification so that in all ordinary cases all of this would happen within approximately a 30-day period? I would not want the administration to sort of stretch out now and assume that they have got more time for an ordinary arms deal; is that correct?

Mr. SPARKMAN. That is right. As I say, we have not had but a couple of instances where that did not work out. They were, I might say, peculiar situations. Ordinarily we are informally told in the committee that a notification will be coming up, and then shortly thereafter the President submits an informal notice. There is a legal period of time in which he must submit it, and the Senate has a limited time in which to act on it.

Mr. SCHMITT. Well, I appreciate the courtesy of the committee in answering these questions. I feel that they feel as I do that the time should not be prolonged as a result of this provision in the bill.

But I also hope that if it appears as if we are being taken advantage of, so to speak, and if the time stretches out to be ordinarily 60 days, the Senator would come back to Congress and say, "I think we better go back to the 30-day period, because we are being taken advantage of." I anticipate that is what the committee would do, but I just want to be assured that that is true.

Mr. SPARKMAN. The Senator is correct. Let me say that there were only two instances, I believe, in which we had to ask for extra time.

Mr. SCHMITT. Mr. President, with those assurances, I will withdraw the amendment, and thank the committee again for their assurances.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is withdrawn.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SCHMITT. I yield.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mike Pillsbury of my staff and Jan Olson of the Budget Committee staff be accorded the privilege of the floor during the consideration of this legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1513

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment at the desk, and ask that it be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The second assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1513:

On page 31, line 8, add the following new section:

NONIMMIGRANT VISAS

SEC. 27. Section 21 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State" is deleted.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the names of the following Senators be added as cosponsors of the amendment: Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. BELLMON, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. DOMENICI, Mr. GARN, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. HANSEN, Mr. HATCH, Mr. HAYAKAWA, Mr. HEINZ, Mr. HELMS, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. SCHMITT, Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. WALLOP, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. ROTH, Mr. TOWER, Mr. BENTSEN, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mrs. HUMPHREY, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, and Mr. STONE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. Is this the amendment on which the Senator from Tennessee has a time limitation of 1½ hours?

Mr. BAKER. This is the amendment on which a period of 1 hour is provided. I might advise my colleagues that I think it will take substantially less than 1 hour. I yield myself such time as I may utilize.

Mr. President, this amendment which I have offered to the International Security Assistance Act of 1978 is designed to delete the requirement that the Secretary of State automatically recommend approval of an application for a nonimmigrant visa to a member of a Communist organization seeking to enter the United States.

As most of my colleagues know, Mr. President, entry into the United States by members of Communist organizations is proscribed by law unless the Secretary of State recommends that the Attorney General grant a waiver to such applications for a nonimmigrant, temporary visa. The Foreign Relations Authorization Act for fiscal year 1978 removed the discretion vested in the Secretary of State and required that he recommend approval of such applications automatically. I believe that discretion should be returned to the Secretary.

The reason is simple. Last year, in the afterglow of the Helsinki Accords, we made it easier for Communist officials and party members to enter the United States, a gesture that facilitated our compliance with the final act of Helsinki. It was our hope that this gesture would encourage the Soviet Union and members of the Warsaw Pact to comply with the obligations those nations voluntarily assumed in becoming signatories to the Helsinki Accords, especially those obligations pertaining to the free movement of people and ideas.

As we are all too well aware, Mr. President, that hope was in vain. The Soviet Union has made no attempt to honor its commitments under the final act and in fact its contempt of the ideals expressed at Helsinki appears unending. That contempt—for the freedom of Soviet citizens, for the principals expressed at Helsinki, and for the United States and the other signatories to the final act—was dramatically illustrated in the trials of Anatoly Scharansky and Alexandr Ginzburg. We should also remember that those trials are merely the tip of an iceberg of institutionalized repression of basic human freedoms represented by the Soviet state.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, this amendment and its impact do not merit comparison with the plight of Anatoly Scharansky and the thousands of other victims of Soviet repression. It will constitute, however, one more visible reminder to the Soviet Union that we are willing to hold them to account for their cynical rejection of basic human freedoms.

It will be particularly visible, Mr. President, in the visa applications of so-called labor leaders in the Warsaw Pact nations. Labor organizations in Communist countries bear no relationship to the labor movements in this country and others of the free world to which the principle of the voluntary association of free men and women is fundamental. This country, therefore, has historically made the distinction between the visa applications of purported Communist labor leaders and those of other professions. We have long considered it an insult to the free labor movement of this country to accord the leaders of forced labor official U.S. recognition of a status they in no way deserve.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment as a symbol of our continuing disagreement with the denial of human rights in the Warsaw Pact countries. In the unlikely event that at some point in the future these practices improve, we can reconsider this question. But for now, I am willing to impose this modest inhibition on entry into the United States in response to the absolute prohibitions on the exercise of basic human freedoms in the countries that will be affected.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield me 5 minutes?

Mr. BAKER. I am happy to yield to the distinguished Senator from Washington for 5 minutes.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I commend the minority leader (Mr. BAKER) for sponsoring this amendment. I am pleased to join as a cosponsor of the amendment, which I believe makes eminent good sense. It simply restores to the Secretary of State the discretion he ought to have to grant or withhold visas to foreign visitors to the United States who are members of proscribed organizations, including Communist organizations. As matters now stand, the Secretary is required to recommend that visas be granted, regardless of the circumstances of the visa request, the state of relations with the country involved, or other factors that any sensible and flexible policy would surely take into account.

Nothing in the Helsinki Final Act dictates the internal deliberative procedures by which we decide whether or not to grant visas to enter the United States. In any event, the blatant record of Soviet violations of the Helsinki Final Act does not argue for a totally undiscriminating policy on our part. On the contrary: We need discretion in the granting of visas to members of proscribed organizations if we wish to have leverage in securing visas for Americans who desire to visit the Communist countries. If we are in a position, as necessary, to trade visa for visa—a situation that requires discretion on a case-by-case basis—we are more likely to expand the flow of people across international borders in a manner consistent with the spirit and letter of the Helsinki Final Act.

Mr. President, it makes no sense to give a blank check to overseas members of the Communist Party, to members of terrorist organizations, and to others whose entry to the United States ought to be subject to careful deliberation.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Washington for his remarks, for his cosponsorship, and for his support of this amendment. I have no further requests for speakers on this side at this time, and I reserve the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota.

UPHOLDING A VALUABLE SYMBOL

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, it is a curious coincidence that in considering this Security Assistance bill, the Senate has been asked to deal with two provisions which, though of substantial importance, are largely symbolic. The first, of course, was the so-called Turkish embargo. The second, now the subject before us, is a provision enacted last year—a so-called McGovern amendment relating to visa applications by prospective visitors to the United States.

In the case of the almost nonexistent embargo against Turkey, I argued earlier my strong belief that symbolism was proving to be counterproductive—that by retaining a provision the primary purpose of which was to stigmatize Turkey, the United States was foregoing its opportunity and duty to foster constructive negotiations on Cyprus. With regard to the visa provision enacted last year, however, my purpose now is to defend symbolism—because the result of altering this provision of law, rather than serving U.S. interests, would be instead to seriously damage those interests by undercutting American leadership in the international fight for human rights.

This may sound like an overstatement. What, after all, do visits to the United States have to do with human rights around the world? The answer, Mr. President, arises from the Helsinki Final Act and the U.S. effort to push for compliance with the provisions of that agreement relating to the freer international movement of people and ideas.

Before that agreement was signed—on August 1, 1975—the United States already had a solid record in this field. Our American policy, however, flawed that record, and was used regularly by our adversaries as evidence of U.S. hypocrisy. This was our policy, embodied in law, with regard to prospective visitors to the United States belonging to organizations adhering to philosophies not approved of in this country, organizations such as the Communist Party. All nations, to be sure, should and do reserve the right to exclude from their boundaries persons constituting a threat to national security. Our law, however, created a presumption against prospective visitors on the basis of ideological affiliation alone—imposing a negative presumption, for example, even against an Italian Communist who espoused peaceful, democratic change.

The implementation of this law, it should be noted, was not nearly as rigid as its appearance. A waiver procedure allowed the Secretary of State to recommend to the Attorney General the granting of a visa, notwithstanding the negative presumption; and in many cases—indeed almost routinely—this method was used. Nonetheless, in the aftermath of the agreement at Helsinki, this law stood as a U.S. liability, for it seemed to say that we were afraid of ideas, of what a visitor to our country might have to say.

This liability was recognized, I would point out, by the U.S. Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe in its 1977 report on implementation of the Helsinki Act, the relevant pages of which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD following my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. McGOVERN. The liability was recognized, too, by the Carter administration, which made clear its intent to use the waiver procedure on a regular basis, so as to show our genuine commitment to implementation of Helsinki principles.

What was really needed, however, was a change in the law itself. It was for this reason that last year I sponsored a provision designed to strengthen the position of the United States in the international fight for human rights by showing, through legislative action, that we are a Nation unafraid of the free flow of ideas and that we have an affinity for the principles of Helsinki not because they have value as a tool for disparaging our adversaries but because they have value in themselves and deserve to be implemented.

The provision I sponsored was intended, in its own words, to achieve "greater United States compliance with the provisions of the final act" and to encourage "other signatories to comply with those provisions." It sought to do so by removing the negative presumption against a prospective visitor whose only possible reason for exclusion was organizational affiliation. It accomplished this by mandating the Secretary of State to act automatically, in such cases, making an immediate waiver recommendation to the Attorney General so that a visa might be issued. No change was made.

I should emphasize, with regard to any person subject to other grounds for exclusion, such as persons who might be involved in advocating or engaging in violence or who might in some other way pose a threat to the national security. Nor was any change made in the ability of the Attorney General or the President to deny the Secretary of State's waiver recommendation with regard to any prospective visitor, even one falling under the terms of the McGovern amendment.

The provision was, in that sense, entirely symbolic, in that it left to the executive branch full flexibility to determine what persons will and will not come to the United States. On the other hand, by making automatic the Secretary's favorable recommendation in cases relating to ideology alone, the provision created a useful symbol, demonstrating a certain maturity and magnanimity on the part of the U.S. Government which might strengthen U.S. leadership in the field of human rights.

Indeed, this was precisely the result. At the Helsinki followup conference held at Belgrade, the U.S. delegation repeatedly found it useful to refer to the new provision as exemplifying the U.S. practices to the principles of the Helsinki agreement. For example, in his opening statement at the Belgrade Conference, Ambassador Goldberg highlighted the effort to conform its own policies and congressional action, in a passage which I shall read for the RECORD at this point:

> Let me comment first on what my own country has done to implement the Final Act. In general, the Act codified standards which reflect American policy in dealing with other nations and with our own citizens. Nevertheless, in response to the Final Act we have looked closely at our own behavior and—where we have found the need and the means—have acted to improve our conduct. In particular, we took two steps regarding the Final Act pledge to "facilitate freer movement and contacts." First, President Carter this year removed all restrictions on travel abroad by American citizens. Second, with President Carter's support, Congress recently relaxed our visa requirements, so that people wishing to visit the United States will not be excluded because of political affiliation or belief, except in the rarest instances.

The change in U.S. law was noted by our allies as well as our adversaries. For example, at its September 1977 session, the North Atlantic Assembly, consisting of parliamentarians of all the NATO countries, passed the following resolution, which in effect formally congratulated the United States on its action:

RESOLUTION ON THE HELSINKI PRINCIPLES AND VISA POLICIES

> The Assembly,
> Recognizing the fundamental validity of the principles set forth in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, signed in August 1975 at Helsinki, and in particular those principles relating to the free movement of people and ideas;
> Noting with approval the steps taken by NATO member countries to comply more fully with the principles of the Final Act, and in particular the recent legislative initiative of the United States in removing from United States visa policy exclusion solely on the basis of political or organizational affiliation;
> Expresses hope that such exemplary efforts at compliance with the Helsinki principles by the NATO and other Western countries will promote increased compliance by Warsaw Pact signatories of the Final Act.

What we are now asked to consider, Mr. President, only a few months later, is a proposal that would alter this valuable symbolic provision, and thereby undercut U.S. prestige. It can only be asked, Why? The answer can perhaps be found in an editorial from Sunday's Washington Post entitled "Chief Visa Officer George Meany?" which I ask be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHIEF VISA OFFICER GEORGE MEANY?

> Sen. Howard Baker (R-Tenn.) gave his colleagues fair warning the other day that he was about to submit an amendment restoring the old cold-war way of processing the visa applications of communists who wanted to visit the United States. The old way was simply to keep communists out unless the State Department requested a waiver to let them in. That approach was changed last year, in an amendment offered by Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.), to let communists in unless the State Department requests a waiver to keep them out. That's the proper way, expressing this country's traditional openness and hospitality to foreigners and establishing the presumption that they're welcome to come.

Mr. Baker justifies his request for a rollback on grounds that the communist countries have defaulted on their Helsinki pledges to allow "freer movements and contacts" among signatory nations. In fact, though the communists' performance has been far from fully satisfying, the Helsinki Accords have provided a standard by which communist performance could be judged. The United States, in passing the McGovern amendment last year, was responding precisely to the letter and spirit of the Helsinki Accords. That amendment has been a useful piece of diplomatic ammunition to the United States since its passage. Mr. Baker and many others are currently protesting against Moscow's falling away from various pledges it made at Helsinki. This is no time for the United States to fall away from its own.

There is really only one serious opponent of the McGovern amendment—the AFL–CIO, which has been carrying on its own private anti-travel war with Soviet-bloc countries for many years. George Meany evidently has a heavy personal investment in the position that to let communist trade unionists into this country is to give them a political seal of approval. We find the argument unpersuasive and the policy designed to support it retrogressive. George Meany is not the country's chief visa officer, and Mr. Baker should not offer him the post.

Mr. McGOVERN. Today there has been circulated in the Senate a letter from George Meany, who is the man behind this amendment and who has written to Senators calling upon them to support it.

Let me be blunt, Mr. President. Mr. Meany's letter is a preposterous fabrication—nothing less, a preposterous fabrication. In it, he points the picture of the McGovern amendment having opened the borders of the United States to a horde of Soviet KGB spies, who have supposedly traveled here disguised as trade union leaders and committed unspeakable acts of espionage against our country. This is plain, unadulterated baloney, to put a charitable word on it.

Mr. President, I asked the State Department to prepare a list of the persons who have come to the United States over the past year who might be said to have come in under the terms of the McGovern amendment. I should emphasize that a precise figure is impossible to select because the McGovern amendment does not require the administration to let anyone in. It does, however, encourage the administration to adopt a more tolerant attitude toward prospective visitors who are members of so-called "proscribed organizations." Since the administration was inclined to adopt a more tolerant attitude anyway—so as to be able to assume international leadership in the fight for implementation of the Helsinki principles—it is difficult to trace causation precisely. But it can be said that in the past year approximately 40 persons have come to the United States who, in past years, according to past policies, would not have been allowed to come to the United States.

The number, Mr. President, is 40. Not 40,000. Not 4,000. Not 400. But 40. And of this number, a high percentage are not even from Warsaw Pact countries. Some of them are from Australia, some from Italy, some from Finland, others are from other countries. So what we are talking about does not have anything to do with a horde of foreigners—but rather a very small number who might have been let in anyway even without the McGovern amendment, which as I explained earlier is almost entirely symbolic.

Now what about the allegation that they are spies? That is very easy to answer, Mr. President. Anyone judged to be coming to the United States for purposes of espionage does not even fall under the terms of the McGovern amendment. And therefore that allegation is irrelevant and immaterial—nothing more than a scare tactic used as a part of this campaign of misinformation. The McGovern amendment relates only to persons who fall afoul of the category of excludability having to do with organizational affiliation. That is category No. 28 out of a total of 32. Category No. 29 has to do with espionage. Any persons known or thought to be coming to the United States for purposes of espionage would fall into category No. 29 and would therefore not receive the automatic favorable recommendation mandated by the McGovern amendment. So the whole assertion that what we are talking about here is a provision opening the United States to espionage is ridiculous.

Let me again be blunt, Mr. President. What is at issue here is one man's war against Communist trade union leaders. Mr. Meany believes that the phrase "Communist trade union leader" is a contradiction in terms—that communism and trade unionism do not have anything to do with each other and are indeed mutually exclusive. In that, Mr. President, I can agree with Mr. Meany: trade unionism, as we know it in the Western democratic countries, could not exist in a Communist society. But that is as far as my agreement with Mr. Meany goes.

I do not draw the conclusion, as he does, that because I do not approve of a person's system I should not talk to him. I think I have a little more confidence in the United States than that. I do not believe that this country is placed in danger by the beliefs, even if they are articulated, of a handful of foreigners who may come here for a brief visit. On the contrary, I think the odds are that, while they are here, they may learn something—and perhaps go home a little less certain of any dogmatic beliefs they may have brought with them.

Mr. Meany's letter wraps itself in expressions of great concern about human rights. It was precisely a concern for human rights that caused the enactment of the McGovern amendment in the first place, with the open support of the Carter administration. This amendment put this country on record as taking a leadership position in the international fight for implementation of the Helsinki principles. I am proud that we did it, and I think we should hold to it and continue the fight.

Everyone knows that the Soviet Union has not fulfilled its obligations under the Helsinki Final Act. Only a dreamer would have expected that they would. But the Helsinki Act sets standard. And it is now our duty—a long-term duty—to adhere to that standard and to continue to press, month after month, year after year, in every effective way we can find, for other nations, including the Soviet Union, to move toward that standard. It is either that or we start moving toward the standard they have set—of hypocrisy and repression and fear. This is what Mr. Meany asks us to do. I propose that his effort to conduct this Nation's foreign policy be rejected. President Carter and Secretary Vance are making a strong effort to press for implementation of the Helsinki principles. It would be sad indeed if, while pretending to show concern for human rights, the Senate undercut that effort.

We do not make the United States stronger by copying the worst features of the Soviet system. I deplore the trials of Scharansky and Ginsburg. But we will not save either them or others by duplicating the paranoia of the Soviet Union.

I also ask that there be printed in the RECORD at this point a letter from Secretary of State Vance in which he warns that a successful effort to reverse this provision, "when we are criticizing the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries for violations in human rights field, would be to rob our efforts of force and credibility." The Secretary reminds us also that—

Not only the Soviets, but also many of our friends in Western Europe would wonder about the sincerity of a Government and Congress which urge progress on others while at the same time moving backwards in the administration of its own legislation.

I hope strongly that the Senate will defeat the proposal to change existing law.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE SECRETARY OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., June 27, 1978.

Hon. GEORGE MCGOVERN,

DEAR SENATOR MCGOVERN: I have been informed that there may be an effort to remove the "McGovern Amendment" from the State Department authorization bill. This proposal, if adopted, would be extremely detrimental to U.S. efforts to further respect for human rights and to persuade other nations to permit freer movement of persons.

Since last year the U.S. has been able to use the McGovern Amendment both as a tool to allow a fuller interchange of ideas between journalists and political officials of Western and Eastern countries alike and as an example which we hope others will emulate of our determination to implement the letter of the Helsinki Final Act. This commitment was highlighted at the recent Belgrade follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, during which members of our delegation referred several times to the McGovern Amendment as the type of provision which other countries should adopt as a means of stimulating a freer flow of persons and ideas. In its report on implementation of the Helsinki

Final Act, issued on September 23, 1977, the CSCE Commission specifically criticized the U.S. immigration practices which were later amended by the McGovern Amendment as being inconsistent with the Helsinki accord.

For the United States to repeal the McGovern Amendment at this point, when we are criticizing the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries for violations in the human rights field, would be to rob our efforts of force and credibility. Not only the Soviets, but also many of our friends in Western Europe would wonder about the sincerity of a Government and Congress which urge progress on others while at the same time moving backwards in the administration of its own legislation. Public commitment to the goals of the Helsinki Final Act in the United States could also be weakened by this example of American disregard for the spirit of this undertaking.

The careful discussions which led to adoption of the McGovern Amendment a year ago were to my mind a prime example of the way in which the Administration and the Congress can work together to achieve practical progress on complicated technical issues. It would be very unfortunate if the benefits which have already been gained from this cooperation were to be lost by removal of the McGovern provision from the books.

Sincerely,

CYRUS VANCE.

EXHIBIT 1

EXCERPT FROM THE AUGUST 1, 1977, REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

UNITED STATES

The United States has taken action—under the stimulus of the Final Act—to bring its passport and visa issuance practices more nearly into compliance with implicit Helsinki standards. In March 1977, President Carter ordered the removal of what he called "the last remaining restrictions" on foreign travel by Americans, provisions which had made U.S. passports invalid for travel to Albania, Cuba and North Korea. He also announced that the United States "will move to liberalize travel opportunities to America." [44]

More precisely, Secretary of State Vance told the Commission in early June, "the whole visa question is under consideration in the Executive Branch right now." [45] The Executive review, however, has so far produced no notable changes in the cumbersome and controversial procedures by which U.S. officials are bound in determining whether or not to admit an alien for a temporary or permanent stay in the United States. Action by the Congress and the President in August may result in a marked simplification of the visa-issuance process in 1977, but the United States will nonetheless be open to justifiable criticism at the Belgrade conference for failures fully to honor the Final Act provisions "to improve conditions in this [human contacts] area."

Cumbersome U.S. visa policies affect visitors from all countries, as an Industry-Government Special Task Force reported in 1968:

"Entry procedures for vacation and business visitors to the United States are outmoded. They serve only to project an adverse image of this nation's willingness to receive foreign guests. They are overly defensive and bespeak an unfriendly attitude based upon feelings of suspicion. . . .

"In order that the United States rid itself of this stigma, a dramatic new policy of simplified procedures must be adopted, specifically geared to the short term visitor." [46]

Visa procedures have not changed significantly since the issuance of the report.

U.S. compliance problems originate in the 1952 (McCarran-Walter) Immigration and Nationality Act, establishing 32 categories of aliens considered ineligible to receive entry visas. While many of the categories are unexceptional, one definition does proscribe entry by aliens who are or have been members or affiliates of a Communist organization. The proscription can be lifted by a waiver from the Attorney General, and 96 percent of those initially refused visas in fiscal year 1975 under the terms of section 212(a) 28 did, in fact, receive such waivers.

One class of applicants—Communist trade unionists intending to meet with labor union groups in the United States—has been, before and since Helsinki, systematically denied those waivers. Although, at the insistence of U.S. negotiators, the Final Act makes no mention of encouraging trade union contacts, the practice of denying them admission to the country can scarcely be reconciled with the overall thrust of the Helsinki accord.

Nor do such practices gibe with the specific Basket III subsection under which signatories committed themselves to "facilitate wider travel . . . for personal and professional reasons" and registered their intention "gradually to simplify and to administer flexibly" existing visa procedures. The pledge to make conditions easier for temporary travel applies across the board. Conditions are to be eased for all travelers—butchers, bakers, candlestick-makers and trade union representatives.

It can certainly be argued that Communist unionists travel on false pretenses, representing a political affiliation rather than a commitment to the labor movement. In the open American marketplace, however, that argument can best be made in direct confrontation of opposing views. The argument is not served by an a priori exclusion of spokesmen for one side of it.

In recent months, for instance, an Australian Communist labor leader and environmental expert was barred from attending a union-organized discussion of environmental protection issues, although he had previously been admitted to the United States to lecture to Sierra Club audiences. Three Soviet trade unionists, invited to a longshoremen's union convention in Seattle this April, were also denied visas. On occasion, U.S. consular officials in Moscow have found themselves in the embarrassing position of issuing visas to U.S.S.R. unionists, but conditioning the visas with written instructions to the Soviets not to make contact with American unionists during their visit.

U.S. practice, in short, is discriminatory. The grounds for the discrimination—that Communist unionists are government agents and neither free nor true representatives of workers—reflect a mind-set the Final Act does not condone.

Every nation, of course, has the right to bar entry to individuals whose presence could jeopardize its security, but that standard does not appear to be the one applied at present to Communist trade unionists seeking visas to the United States. The difference between American rhetoric and practice on the issue of expanding travel opportunities is one which exposes this country to telling criticism from other signatories, including those whose practices in the same field are profoundly at variance with Helsinki standards.

That same divergence also undermines otherwise sound U.S. protests against Communist restrictions on professional travel of Warsaw Pact state subjects. Americans are right to seek freedom for Prof. Benjamin Levich to attend an Oxford colloqium in his honor, for Pavel Kohout to see the Broadway opening of his play or for Andrei Sakharov to receive his Nobel Peace Prize in person. But right or wrong, Americans cannot be effective while vulnerable to charges that their own restrictions on similar travel are in violation of the Final Act.

[46] Report to the President of the United States from the Industry-Government Special Task Force on Travel (Washington, D.C.: U.S. Government Printing Office, 1968), p. 27.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I hope strongly that the Senate will defeat the proposal to change existing law.

Mr. President, I reserve the remainder of my time.

(Mr. NUNN assumed the chair.)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have only a few brief words; then I wish to yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

I have served with the distinguished Senator from South Dakota for some years now in the Senate and for a shorter time on the Committee on Foreign Relations, as a colleague on the other side of the aisle in that committee and in this Chamber. I have high regard and respect for him. I do not challenge his motives or his motivation in offering this amendment in the first place.

But for the life of me, I cannot understand how we improve the cause of human rights or implement the principles of the Helsinki Accords by robbing the Secretary of State of the discretion to decide who should be issued a visa and who should not. This is not an effort to serve the single purpose and cause of a labor leader or a labor organization but, rather, to try to repair a serious mistake in the skein of the foreign policy of this country.

Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader.

Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, of which I have the honor to be a cosponsor. I wish to speak first to the matter just alluded to which is, what does the amendment do?

It gives to the Secretary of State discretion with respect to admitting to the U.S. persons that were formerly, by their most avowed and explicit ideological political concerns, adversaries of our political system. It is a discretion which the Secretary of State ought properly to have at a time in our relations with the Soviet Union when the President, himself, has demonstrated the uses of and the need for such discretion.

Mr. President, it is surely understood in this Chamber that the relationship between our democracy and the Soviet Union has undergone a great strain from the time, a year ago, when the distinguished Senator from South Dakota, in what surely must have seemed to this whole Senate as a wholly appropriate, open, attractive gesture to the rulers of the Soviet at a time when a new President had come to office in our Nation, was reaching out, speaking of human rights, speaking of cooperation. We changed a long-established policy as a gesture of good will, as an act of bona fides, if you will. And what have we had in return? Was the measure interpreted as one of willingness to go forward together or was it interpreted as, somehow, another evidence of retreat?

It was intended as nothing of the kind. No one could ever suggest such a thing of the Senator from South Dakota. But what was the response of that dense and difficult and yet, somehow, predictably perverse Soviet mentality, the mentality of the Central Committee, other than to say, "Now, they are falling back; push harder."

And what did they do to President Carter in his efforts to be open and understanding? They became more closed and more opposed to the things that we have stood for than ever they have been in this decade.

Just recently, in a quite extraordinary act in the course of this year, a Soviet dissident was arrested and charged with being an agent of the American intelligence system, of the CIA. The President of the United States did something no chief of state should ever have to do. He said, "This is not so. I say to you, leaders of the Soviet Union, no, Mr. Scharansky is not."

And what did they do in response to that openness, that involvement in issues which any head of state ought to be spared in public?

They convicted him and they sent him to Siberia for 13 years. In so doing, they said that the President of the United States is a liar, his human rights policy is one of subversion, and his efforts have failed and will fail.

They have done the same thing in response to this equally earnest and understandable and, in the circumstances, quite reasonable measure. They have thrown it in our face.

Mr. President, there is a connection here between the external behavior of the Soviet Union and its internal purposes. There can be no question that the simultaneous trials of the Soviet dissidents just 2 weeks ago were intended to establish in the mind of Soviet citizens that what the President of the United States may say about human rights is said for the internal consumption of his own people and would have no consequences in the relations between the two nations.

The message being that those dissidents who might hear what we have to say, who hope for some improvement, would be doomed to complete disappointment and frustration, that they would go to prison as inexorably, they would disappear as completely, as ever before, and perhaps more so.

The Soviet people know full well what it is to have a government saying things for internal consumption and not meaning them, and they were told the United States does not mean it. The most brutal sentences were imposed in this case, publicly imposed sentences, in order that all the rest should know what they had to expect without the small benefit of the Western World knowing.

Then, Mr. President, what did the President do? As urged by the distinguished Senator from Washington, who I see is on the floor, the President was urged by Senator JACKSON to do something specific, to withhold some ongoing program, to make a gesture at once substantive and symbolic and, in the particular case, not to sell to the Soviet Union a Univac computer, to say to the Soviet Union that we connect technology with human rights, we know if you send your computer scientists to Siberia you will have to import your computer science from us and we will not cooperate, we will not let you escape the cost of punishing and oppressing your own people and just wasting their creativity.

And the President did it. There are few of us in this Chamber who have not congratulated him for doing so. He used the discretion he had.

Now, Mr. President, this measure restores to the Secretary of State a comparable level of discretion to be used for the same purposes, and in the same spirit of wishing to cooperate, we can withhold our cooperation in the face of hostility and contempt.

In particular, I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that dissent in the Soviet Union is not confined to intellectuals. It is not a matter of unique minorities only. It is not an affair of scientists who live in an international world, who inevitably have outside contacts, of religious groups that are part of a worldwide religious community that have outside contacts.

Mr. President, the workers of the Soviet Union are as oppressed as any citizens of that vast darkness and they, too, are trying to be heard. They, too, are making their voices heard. Their names somehow never come forward, but their voices have been heard.

I have here, Mr. President, a random collection of newspaper articles from the New York Times over the last year by some of the distinguished correspondents in Moscow, David K. Shipler, Craig R. Whitney, recently hauled into a Soviet court for the presumption to suggest that there might be something not altogether impeccable in the reporting of Soviet television.

I would read the headlines: "Soviet Workers Tell of Hazards of Complaining."

Complain about your work and off you go to jail in the Soviet Union.

"Dissident Unionists in Moscow Pledge Continuing Struggle."

A continuing struggle, Mr. President, that they ought to know that we know about.

"Soviet Seizes Miner Who Took Criticism to U.S. Reporters. More Soviet Workers Air Protests. Disgruntled Workers in Soviet Decide To Form Unofficial Union."

I ask unanimous consent to have these articles printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOVIET WORKERS TELL OF HAZARDS OF COMPLAINING

(By David K. Shipler),

Moscow, December 1.—What happens when a Soviet worker asks for a raise, or complains about safety violations on the job, or uncovers corruption among his employers.

The chances are he will be insulted, reprimanded, or dismissed and, if he persists, confined to a mental institution, according to a group of workers who say they have been persecuted for exercising what they call "the right of complaint".

Half a dozen of these workers gathered the other day in a small apartment on the southern edge of Moscow to tell their stories to American correspondents. It was a rare event in this country, for these were not dissidents seeking political freedom or Jews trying to emigrate to Israel.

They were ordinary workers—among them a waitress, a coal miner, a locksmith and a housing-maintenance man—who seemed basically loyal to the Soviet system and who had dutifully reported wrongdoing to every conceivable agency of the Government and the Communist Party before turning, as a last resort to the Western press.

What they had to say revealed a pervasive contempt in Soviet society for workers' safety and interests, a widespread tolerance of embezzlement and corruption and intense friction at times between employees and their bosses.

Their stories cannot be verified because of the Soviet Union's practice of refusing to comment on criticism. But the workers insisted that their experiences were common, and that the places where they all first met each other—the reception rooms of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, the prosecutor's office and the Supreme Soviet, the nominal parliament—were filled every day with at least a hundred people who had come to Moscow in the faulty belief that higher authorities might listen to them sympathetically.

The leader of the growing group is Vladimir A. Klebanov, a 45-year-old coal miner from the Donets Basin who found trouble when, as a shift foreman, he became concerned about the safety of his men.

Because of what he called his mine's "unrealistically high plan" of coal production, miners often had to work 12-hour days instead of the normal six hours, he said. As a result, they became tired and careless, he said, and accidents took the lives of 12 to 15 people a year and injured 600 to 700 in his mine alone.

The authorities kept the deaths and injuries as secret as they could, he charged, and refused to investigate the causes. For his complaints, he said, he had been dismissed after 16 years in the mine and then had been sent to a psychiatric hospital for four and a half years.

Nadezhda V. Kurakina, worked for 25 years as a waitress in a Volgograd restaurant run by the local party organization.

"Fidel Castro was in our restaurant," she said. "Comrade Brezhnev, Kosygin—I served all of them."

Mrs. Kurakina said she had discovered that the restaurant administrators were stealing crockery by reporting it broken and then docking the salaries of waitresses they accused of breaking it. She said she had first written letters but had not gotten any response, so she had complained at an open meeting of restaurant workers.

She had been dismissed, she said, and her husband had also lost his job. The party secretary of the Volgograd region, whom she had served for 20 years, would not even see her, she said. Nor did higher officials in Moscow want to hear her complaints.

She lost her pension and was unable to find other jobs, she said. As in all these cases, her dismissal was noted in her "work booklet," a passport-like document she must show wherever she applies for work. As a result, no agency, factory, office or retail outlet will employ her or anyone else who had been dismissed on such grounds.

Anatoly N. Poznyakov, a thin, bespectacled epileptic, worked as a locksmith for 75 rubles, about $103, a month at Moscow's Institute of Biochemistry. When he asked for a raise, "they insulted me crudely," he said. When he appealed to the local party organization, he reported, he was told that he had apparently forgotten that his destiny in life was to eat from a pig's trough.

Angry, he continued his protests and was dismissed from his job. At the age of 39, he receives only about $28 a month for his disability, and lives on his mother's small pension of about $62 a month. It is not enough, but when he asked for help from the Academy of Sciences, which oversees the institute, an official told him: "If you can, live. If you can't, die."

Valentin T. Poplavsky, 44, worked for a factory in Klimovsk, near Moscow, as a supervisor of maintenance in workers' housing. He said that officials had used factory funds to finance drunken parties, and when a woman employee complained, he had been ordered to write a false criticism of her in her record.

When he refused, he said, the factory's party organization admonished him, the county prosecutor warned him that if his accusations could not be proved "we'll take the strongest possible measures against you" and he was finally dismissed from his job. Because of the entry in his work booklet, he said, he cannot find another position.

Shagen A. Oganesyan, a 37-year-old Armenian, was an engineer at an agency in Yerevan that repaired and renovated electrical plants. Elected to the People's Control Commission to guard against corruption, he took his job a bit too seriously, checking to see that work paid for had actually been done.

He found that about half of it had not been, that the money had simply disappeared. His insistence in reporting the irregularities, he said, had caused rejection of his application to go to Poland on a job and his transfer to a lesser post. He had then quit in protest.

According to case histories compiled by the group, psychiatric hospitals are often used as a weapon by the authorities against stubborn complainers. Picked up by the police, workers are frequently subjected to "conversations" with psychiatrists and sometimes given jail sentences of 10 to 15 days for "hooliganism," they said.

Sitting around the living room, they were fired with an outrage seldom seen in political dissidents, many of whom abandoned faith in the system long ago. By contrast, these are people who still seem startled by the emptiness of the rhetoric they have heard from the country's leaders.

"Our unions don't defend our rights," said Mr. Klebanov, the miner.

"Our unions aren't like Western unions," said Mr. Poznyakov, the locksmith.

"Our unions have no power," said Mrs. Kurakina, the waitress.

In all these voices there ran the sound of amazement.

Dissident Unionists in Moscow Pledge Continuing Struggle

(By Craig R. Whitney)

Moscow, February 27.—Supporters of an unofficial labor union that was organized here last month said today that five members, including its leader, had disappeared after being arrested and that the authorities had committed two others to psychiatric hospitals.

"But we don't intend to stop now," said Valentin T. Poplavsky, one of the organizers. He said Vladimir Klebanov, a former coal miner who is the union leader, had not been heard from since he was seized by the security police in Moscow on Feb. 7.

Mr. Poplavsky, a former consumer engineer from the Donets coal district in the Ukraine, told foreign reporters in a Moscow apartment that he could not confirm a report from another dissident group that Mr. Klabanov was being held in a psychiatric hospital in Donetsk, his home town.

UNION CHARTER IS DRAFTED

A union charter, which Mr. Poplavsky said was drawn up by 43 members on Feb. 1, was made available to the reporters. He said members had been receiving letters of support from Soviet citizens, and he put the membership of the group at 200.

Although some of the charter's aims are similar to those of other rights groups, the labor union seems to have arisen at least in part as a result of class divisions and personality clashes between disaffected workers and dissident intellectuals. Despite tentative approaches over the past year, Mr. Poplavsky said, there is no coordination between his group and the dissidents.

Speaking at a recent meeting of a human rights group, Yelena Bonner, wife of Andrei D. Sakharov, the physicist, expressed support for the principle of a free union. But Mr. Poplavsky and another member, Varvara I. Kucherenko, were disdainful of that support today.

"Those people are swindlers," Mrs. Kucherenko said. "We're a union of free workers." She said she was arrested Feb. 6 and kept in a psychiatric hospital for observation until Feb. 10.

The text of the union charter says membership is open to anyone "whose rights and interests have been unlawfully violated by administrative, governmental party or judicial agencies." It declares that the group, calling itself "Free Trade Union of the Soviet Union," is a legal entity and it expresses confidence that it will be supported by the International Labor Organization, a United Nations agency, and by foreign labor unions.

Although some of the union members are workers who lost their jobs after having complained about injustices or safety violations, the group is not concerned mainly with working conditions and higher wages, Mr. Poplavsky said. "We don't have such a narrow goal," he declared. "We want to help people whose rights have been violated."

Soviet Seizes Miner Who Took Criticism to U.S. Reporters

(By David K. Shipler)

Moscow, December 20.—A former coal miner who organized a group of workers to protest corruption and hazardous job conditions was reported today to have been seized by the police and placed in a psychiatric hospital. Other members of his group were said to have been detained for short periods since they conducted an unusual news conference three weeks ago with American correspondents.

The miner, Vladimir A. Klebanov, 45 years old, was apparently arrested yesterday, taken to a police station and then committed to Moscow's Psychiatric Hospital 7, according to Aleksandr Podrabinek, who heads a group monitoring psychiatric abuses.

Mr. Podrabinek said that this was a hospital for transients, and he assumed Mr. Klebanov would be transferred out of Moscow. The miner has already spent a total of four and a half years in mental institutions.

PUBLIC WORKERS DISSENT IS UNUSUAL

Dissent by ordinary workers is unusual in the Soviet Union. Most human-rights activists are scientists and writers who have little contact with the working class and have not dealt with workers' grievances relating to living standards, food shortages and the like.

This contrasts with the link between workers and human-rights advocates in Poland, for example, where events have apparently been watched with some trepidation by the Soviet authorities.

Such a link was nearly established here when Mr. Klebanov approached Andrei D. Sakharov, the physicist who won the 1975 Nobel Peace Prize for his defense of human rights. Dr. Sakharov told some reporters he had refused to get involved because he feared that some of the workers who had signed protests did not understand the risks of open dissent. He told others that he doubted Mr. Klebanov's commitment to individual liberty.

In fact, neither Mr. Klebanov nor the other workers who gathered in a Moscow apartment three weeks ago to talk with reporters seemed to share the views of the human-rights activists. They are not trying to change the system, but are simply outraged at what they saw as injustice.

Mr. Klebanov was a shift foreman in a coal mine, where he worked for 16 years, he said. The men had to work shifts of 12 hours instead of 6 to meet production plans, and their fatigue caused accidents. In this mine, 12 to 15 people a year were killed and 600 to 700 injured, he said. Officials tried to keep the incidents secret and declined remedial action, he said.

His protests brought him dismissal and then commitment to mental institutions, a common fate of those who complain, he said.

Others in his group were a Volgograd waitress who said she had been dismissed for complaining about superiors' stealing crockery, a Yerevan engineer who was reprimanded and demoted for reporting payment for fictitious work, a Moscow locksmith who was dismissed when he persisted in asking for a raise, and a Klimovsk housing maintenance man who lost his job when he sought to expose the use of factory money for drinking parties.

The workers said they had met in the reception rooms of the Central Committee, the Supreme Soviet and the Prosecutor's Office. They said a hundred or more people visited these offices, which are viewed by citizens with grievances as courts of last resort after other avenues of redress fail.

By the end of November, Mr. Klebanov had collected the signatures of 38 workers from 24 cities on an open letter denouncing "the groundless repressions" and "the plundering of people's dignity, the measures of terror used in an attempt to frighten honest citizens."

More Soviets Workers Air Protests

(By David K. Shipler)

Moscow, Jan. 10.—A small group of disgruntled workers held a second news conference for Western correspondents today to press their protests against alleged persecution of those who complained about corruption and other wrongdoing on the job.

Vladimir A. Klebanov, a former coal miner who was placed in a psychiatric hospital and then removed from Moscow after having set up the first meeting six weeks ago, returned to arrange today's session.

Among the workers airing grievances publicly, a new phenomenon in the Soviet Union, was Tamara M. Manakova, head bookkeeper at a Crimea resort, who ran into trouble when she discovered that the manager's wife was taking bribes and selling counterfeit vouchers to prospective vacationers who did not want to wait their turn.

Miss Manakova said resort executives were ordering expensive food, such as cavair and coffee, and keeping it for themselves. They took new sheets and blankets from the hotel rooms and replaced them with their own worn ones, she said.

Once, ordered to sign a requisition for 400 rubles ($560) worth of dishware that had been stolen and falsely reported broken, she refused. She was dismissed three times, and each time reinstated by a local court. The fourth time, last May, a prosecutor intervened against her and she reported jobless.

Valentina V. Chetverikova, who is Mr. Klebanov's wife, said she had been dismissed as a driver for a tuberculosis dispensary because she objected to the use of the official car for personal trips.

Aleksandr P. Barchugov said his Leningrad metal factory had transferred him to lighter work after an injury, but had refused to pay workmen's compensation because it did not want to spoil an accident-free record that insured year-end bonuses. He, too, was dismissed when he persisted in protests.

Venera G. Kashapova, a nurse from Ufa, said she had lived with her mother in an apartment building that was managed by a school where her mother worked. When her mother died, the school principal evicted her, Miss Kashapova said. She applied to her own place of employment, a hospital, for housing, but none was available. When she kept appealing, writing to the Central Committee and the newspaper Pravda, her superior grew angry and dismissed her.

Disgruntled Workers in Soviet Decide to Form Unofficial Union

Moscow, January 26.—A group of protesting workers anounced today that they were forming an unofficial labor union to defend rights allegedly left unprotected by the Government-controlled unions.

The workers, all without jobs after complaining about corruption of safety violations, said they had collected 200 names of those in similar straits who wanted to join the union. The figure could not be verified.

Vladimir A. Klebanov, a former Ukrainian coal-mine foreman, said the step was being taken after attempts to find justice within the system had failed. Following the usual practice of citizens with grievances, the workers had taken their appeals to party and Government authorities and to the Soviet press.

"It is true that there is criticism in the Soviet press," he said, "but it is only propaganda, an exception to the rule. So we need new channels." The new channel, he said, was an appeal through foreign correspondents for support in the West.

"We are unemployed people, basically," he asserted, "and our unions don't defend us."

The formation of an unofficial union, which may incidentally be illegal, can have little practical effect in Soviet society, especially if its members are unemployed. But the act carries symbolic weight in a country that prides itself on maintaining an image as a workers' state founded on workers' interests.

Workers have traditionally shunned dissident activities, and when Mr. Klebanov and his group came to light about two months ago, they stimulated interest among Westerners and a few ordinary Russians. "Troublemakers," was the way one Muscovite described them contemptuously. Another called their emergence "potentially very significant."

Mr. Klebanov, who was accompanied today by four other workers, said the new union, to be named something like the Union for the Defense of Workers Rights, would apply to the International Labor Organization in Geneva for recognition.

The agency, which is affiliated with the United Nations, seeks to promote decent living standards, satifactory conditions of work and pay and adequate employment opportunities. Its main conference is made up of national delegations consisting of people representing government, labor and management. In the case of the Soviet Union, all three are under Communist Party control.

Mr. Klebanov said he hoped that George Meany, president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. would give moral support to the new labor union.

"Many people are indignant," he declared. "But you know what it means to give statements to American correspondents. How this will end we don't know."

Some Russians believe that the kind of official high-handedness and abuse of authority that these workers are protesting is so common throughout Soviet society that their cause can elicit broad sympathy. How many will dare to act on their feelings is another question.

BROADCAST BY VOICE OF AMERICA

Mr. Klebanov said that since news about the group was broadcast in Russian by the Voice of America, about 30 people have written to him at his home address in Donetsk to voice similar complaints. He has no permission to live in Moscow, where residence is restricted, and is in constant danger of being expelled from the city.

Last month, after he gave his first interview to American correspondents, he was seized by the police, placed in a Moscow mental hospital and then freed in his hometown of Donetsk with instructions not to return to the capital. He came back anyway.

I.L.O. Says It Cannot Aid Dissident Soviet Workers

Geneva, April 14.—The International Labor Organization said today it could not respond to a call for help from 200 workers in the Soviet Union who were trying to establish a trade union free of government control.

Soviet Miner Who Was Seized After Complaint to Press Is Freed

Moscow, January 3.—A miner who told Western journalists that abuses of workers' rights by management were widespread in the Soviet Union, spent a week in psychiatric detention but is now free, dissident sources said today.

Vladimir Klebanov, 45 years old, was released near his home in the Ukraine's Donets Basin on Wednesday after being picked up by the police on Dec. 20 in Moscow, the sources said.

He was one of a group of workers who said just over a month ago that they had been dismissed from their jobs and barred from other employment after standing up for workers' rights. Their accounts were published in several Western newspapers.

Police in Moscow Arrest Five Founders of Union

Moscow, February 7.—The police arrested five founders of an independent union organized last month to protest alleged violations of workers' rights, said Nikolai Ivanov, a spokesman for the group, today.

He said the five may be sent to their home cities rather than being imprisoned.

They met in Moscow after coming individually to complain to central authorities about job conditions in their home cities. When they received no satisfaction, they helped found the Trade Union for the Defense of Workers. The leader of the group, Valdimir A. Klebanov, a former coal miner from the Ukraine who went underground to escape arrest, said the movement would seek recognition from the International Labor Organization in Geneva.

Disaffected Workers Publicly Defend Their Rights

(By Elizabeth C. Scheetz)

(Summary: In recent months a number of unemployed workers have met with Western newsmen in Moscow. They allege that they are the victims of official persecution: their "offense" being the persistent criticism of wrongdoings at their places of work. Having received no redress of their grievances within the system, they decided to "go public"; they also announced the formation of an independent trade union. This article reviews the recent activities of these disaffected Soviet citizens. It attempts to place their expression of purely worker-related grievances within the framework of worker participation in the general phenomenon of Soviet dissent. Finally, the paper suggests certain parallels between the workers' initiative and the development of dissent among the Soviet intelligentsia.)

The phenomenon of dissidents in the USSR openly airing their grievances to foreign correspondents has become a familiar one, and nowadays such encounters are more likely to be dramatic for what they reveal than for the fact that they take place. Yet when a group of disgruntled Soviet citizens decided to hold a series of news conferences in Moscow in recent months, their initiative caused a stir. The reason is clear: the individuals involved in these meetings are neither intellectuals nor representatives of particular faiths or national minorities. In short, they do not come from those segments of the public most often associated with dissent. Rather, they are workers, the stuff of Soviet society, and they voiced working-class concerns.[1]

Official Soviet propaganda conspicuously tries to portray dissidents in the USSR as an insignificant group of intellectual renegades, isolated and ineffectual not only because their numbers are small but also because their cause is alien to the overwhelming majority of their fellow citizens. Not long ago, Yurii Andropov, the head of the KGB, claimed that dissidents in the Soviet Union "dare not speak at any factory, kolkhoz, or enterprise; they would have to clear out as fast as their legs could carry them."[2] Since workers and kolkhozniks comprise two-thirds of the entire economic, social, and political life of the country,[3] Andropov's remarks certainly portray the official view of the way things should be. The extent to which his remarks are also a statement of fact remains to be seen. At any rate, open and coordinated action by blue-collar workers with bread-and-butter complaints is bound to be cause for apprehension among Soviet leaders, and the authorities did not lose much time in moving to stifle the initiative.

RECENT ACTIVITIES OF DISAFFECTED SOVIET WORKERS

The complaints surfaced three months ago when a small group of jobless Soviet workers met with Western correspondents in Moscow and turned over to them an open letter signed by dozens of unemployed workers who alleged that they were victims of official persecution. "We are a vast army of Soviet unemployed, thrown out of the gates of Soviet enterprises for attempting to exercise the right to complain, the right to criticize, the right to freedom of speech," the document reads. "We undertook to offer publicly critical remarks against the plundering of Socialist property, bad conditions of work, low pay, high injury rates, the raising of production norms leading to waste and low-quality production." Instead of being praised for their efforts, the signatories maintain, they were insulted, reprimanded, and eventually fired. Some were even confined to mental institutions when they persisted in their criticism.

According to the workers, the reception halls of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, of the Procurator's office, and of the Supreme Soviet are filled with persons who, having exhausted the possibilities on the local level (including complaints to the press, appeals to the trade unions, and actions in the courts), have come to Moscow to seek redress from such injustices. It was in these rooms that they met one another. Only when all their attempts to obtain satisfaction through official channels had failed did they, in frustration, decide to turn to the Western press to air their grievances.[4] They emphasized that they were not "dissidents" (the open letter notes that the signatories have no political objections to the Soviet system) but merely working people hoping to correct specific wrongdoings.

---

Three weeks after the first press conference, Vladimir Klebanov, the workers' spokesman, was picked up. Taken first to a police station, the former coal miner and shift foreman was then brought to a Moscow psychiatric hospital.[5] After spending a week in psychiatric detention, he was released near his home in the Ukrainian Donbass region.[6] He returned to the Soviet capital for a second meeting (on January 10) with Western newsmen. On this occasion Klebanov was one of several workers who made new information public on cases of persecution of workers.[7]

The activities of the workers gained perceptible momentum when, on January 26, they announced the establishment of an official trade union for the defense of workers' rights. In Klenbanov's words, he and four others had taken this remarkable step because the government-controlled unions fail to protect people from injustices at their jobs. He said that the new union—which is open to skilled and unskilled laborers—would undertake to issue public appeals on behalf of workers who have been treated unfairly. It would also seek recognition from the International Labor Organization. Already about 200 persons are said to want to join the unofficial union.[8]

On February 7, Soviet authorities detained the men who had announced the formation of the independent trade union, reportedly on the pretext that they did not have permits to reside in Moscow.[9] In all, five members of Klebanov's group are unaccounted for and presumed to be in custody; two others are in psychiatric hospitals.[10] This action by the authorities constitutes an obvious attempt to silence the workers' protests, and it also lends a special credibility to their stories. The response of the workers to repression of this kind has been to reaffirm their commitment to their cause.[11]

THE PHENOMENON OF DISSENT AMONG SOVIET WORKERS

To an observer of the developments outlined above, the inevitable question arises: to what extent do workers figure in Soviet dissent? While it is largely held that dissent is the domain of intellectuals in the USSR, it must be recalled that the term "dissent" is a broad one that includes a variety of outlooks and causes. Within this spectrum it is possible to identify various manifestations of worker participation. Perhaps the most obvious example of this is the case of workers defending workers' rights. In this respect, Klebanov and his group are especially significant. Though individual samizdat documents in the past have included some discussions of labor issues in the Soviet Union, Klebanov and his group offer the most coordinated and articulate expression of purely worker-related grievances to date.[12]

Workers in the USSR have also been known to participate in the defense of nonlabor issues. In such cases they are generally united (and identified) by an affiliation other than that of class. This involves primarily workers who are members of religious or national groups like the Pentecostals or the ethnic Germans.[13] A few Soviet workers have come to embrace issues that extend beyond workers' rights on the one hand and national or religious issues on the other. Such prominent personalities as Anatolii T. Marchenko, a long-time political prisoner and the author of My Testimony (an exposé of Soviet penal institutions), and Vladimir E. Borisov, one of the founders of the Action Group for the Defense of Human Rights, number in this group. Both men may be considered members of what is called the Soviet democratic movement.[14] Traditionally, working-class participation in the democratic movement has been minimal.[15] To some extent this reflects the fact that the interests of workers tend to be much narrower than those of Soviet human rights activists and, in the absence of an energetic pursuit of the workers' cause by dissident intellectuals, this situation is likely to remain unchanged.

However this may be, it is evident from the pronouncements of Klebanov and his fellow workers that they feel they have little in common with the more intellectual political dissidents. According to the coal miner, he had met well-known Soviet dissidents, but, in his opinion, "they consider themselves above us."[16] It had been reported earlier that Klebanov had approached Andrei Sakharov for assistance, but at the time the human rights activist did not wish to become involved with the workers: he feared that some of those who had signed letters of protest did not fully understand the risk of open dissent. Sakharov also doubted Klebanov's commitment to individual liberty.[17] Later, the unofficial Moscow group monitoring Soviet implementation of the Helsinki accords issued a statement to the effect that it had registered the announcement of an independent trade union "with interest."[18]

CONCLUSION

Workers' criticism of deficiencies in enterprises is a well-established part of the Soviet system. Newspapers in the USSR are filled with criticism—spontaneous and otherwise—that is designed to help improve working conditions. It would appear, however, that such an "escape valve" sometimes provides little relief for those who have been wronged. and, to judge from the experiences of Klebanov and his comrades, for some Soviet citizens internal avenues for redress of grievances are blocked.

The recent initiative of disaffected Soviet workers is significant because in their frustration they have found it necessary to go outside the system in order to make known their complaints. In this they are repeating a phenomenon that has characterized the development of dissent among the intellectuals. Most of the better known dissidents among the creative intelligentsia today were originally no more than sympathetic to the views of the rebellious writers of the early and mid-1960s. Their own contribution, they felt, could best be made by working for reform, for liberalization within the system. For them, the act of signing a petition was one that was taken only after long and frustrating efforts to obtain official publication of what they considered to be good literature. For many members of the scientific intelligentsia, the evolution of a dissident posture followed much the same route. "Dissident" in many cases grew out of their inability to prevent Party interference in their scientific work, and public action on their part usually followed by months or years their first attempts to obtain redress from within the system. Another interesting parallel recommends itself. Just as the dissidents have sought to avoid such term as "oppositionist" in describing themselves, the workers are now anxious to avoid having the term "dissident" applied to them. It would be wrong to call "dissident" a euphemism for "opposition," but Soviet propaganda has tried to reduce it to that. The newcomers to the search for ways of correcting the Soviet system—that is, the disaffected workers—make it clear that matters, even semantical ones, are not all that simple.

See Le Monde, September 1, 1977.

[13] Significant numbers of Pentecostals have sought to emigrate from the USSR in recent years on the grounds that they are subjected to religious persecution in that country, while many ethnic Germans have done so for reasons of family reunification. Since emigration from the Soviet Union is in general only sanctioned on grounds of family reunification, the efforts of the Pentecostals have been unsuccessful to date. See, for example, RL 284/77, "The Quest of Believers in the USSR for Religious Freedom in 1977," December 16, 1977.

[14] Theodore Friedgut provides the following definition of the democratic movement: "those who advocate general political change in the Soviet Union and express their opinions outside the framework of the Communist Party." He notes that this definition "distinguishes the democrats from reform Communists acting only within the Party, on the one hand, and those interested in primarily in specific changes—freedom of emigration for Jews, specific national or religious rights, etc.—on the other hand. There are, of course, some overlaps in which persons campaigning for particular rights also press for general political reform." Amalrik provides a breakdown of the social composition of this group. While the results of such a study can only be considered tentative (it is based on the occupations of persons who signed letters of protest against the Ginzburg-Galanskov trial in January, 1968), it is nonetheless interesting to note that of the 700 workers involved in the analysis, only forty (six percent) were workers. Mr. MOYNIHAN. Now, Mr. President, these people speak for human rights as much as do the physicists and the computer scientists and the poets and the novelists.

We are agreed on the floor of the U.S. Senate by adopting this amendment and would say we have heard their voices and we have given to the Secretary of State the discretion he ought to have to respond to brutality and affront and challenge, just as the President did in the face of the same treatment of the better known dissidents, whose heartbreaking trials took place a fortnight ago.

To sum up my judgment, Mr. President, it would be this; we are challenged by the Soviet Union to back off from the decent commitments our President made. He has shown he can respond to this challenge by exercising discretion he has with respect to export licenses.

We are giving the Secretary of State the further capacity in restoring the discretion he ought to have about the Soviet exports of nominal trade union leaders. If ever there was or will be an inversion of truth, it is that the trade union leader to the instruments of state oppression which are sent to the United States, paraded around and returned, to have the Soviet people hear of the tumultuous reception they have received.

The final word, and only this, it has been suggested the American trade unionist movement is interested in this legislation. Well, we may be sure, Mr. President, it is.

It is the trade union movement that has been interested in the indignity of the words, trade union movement and trade union leader, for 60 years in the face of the debauchery of the meaning of those words by the rulers of the Soviet Union, in a trade union movement that has earned the right to speak.

When Alexander Solzhenitsyn came to the United States for the first time, he came as a guest of the AFL–CIO. He was not, I am sorry to say, received in the White House, but he was welcomed in the house of labor and he felt welcome and he said so, and he said something fundamental about the amendment we have here today.

He said that in 1947 when all the world was silent about the Gulag Archipelago, the American Federation of Labor published a map of the place. They published the map with the names of the camps and details of the people living death inside them.

He said that was a commitment that is not to be forgotten. It is a commitment sustained not over the past 6 weeks or 6 months or 6 years, but 6 decades.

When those men come to us to ask, in the name of free trade unionism, that we do something, they have earned the right to be heard. I would say that the American people should expect that the Senate would feel that it has incurred a responsibility to listen.

I congratulate the principal sponsor of the amendment. I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I will take 1 minute to express my gratitude to the distinguished Senator from New York for his eloquence for his support, for his contribution to this effort.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. RANDOLPH) be added as a cosponsor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I have listened to the debate and the statements of all Senators, and I certainly cannot quarrel much with anything that has been said. However, as a member of the Commission for Security and Cooperation in Europe, I would like to point up two or three matters that are of some concern.

Having been to Belgrade on two occasions and having visited Ambassador Goldberg, and knowing how the Soviets have used this one item in their discussion of the Helsinki Final Act, it seems to me that if we restore the law to bar Soviet officials and Warsaw Pact officials from obtaining visas unless they get a waiver, we are discriminating against certain people, because of their political beliefs, which is a violation of the Helsinki Agreement, the so-called Basket I. It goes against the clause encouraging human contact, which is Basket II.

In 1977, we urged repeal of these restrictions; and I am wondering now, if we do what is suggested by the distinguished minority leader and more than half of the other Members of the Senate, we are not in fact inviting the Soviets to go on a rampage, suggesting that, in effect, we are trying to match them noncompliance for noncompliance.

The present law allows the State Department to bar those they feel are security risks or agents of the KGB. I think the letter received today from Mr. Meany might overstate the case.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I yield.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, at the beginning of this colloquy, I believe I had 8 minutes remaining and the distinguished Senator from South Dakota had 14 minutes remaining. I am perfectly willing to yield part of my 8 minutes, but I wonder if the Senator from South Dakota might yield.

Mr. McGOVERN. The Senator from Kansas is making a case so eloquently, that I would be happy to yield to him.

Mr. BAKER. After listening to the Senator from Kansas, it seems that he might belong to the Senator from South Dakota. [Laughter.]

Mr. McGOVERN. How much time does the Senator want?

Mr. DOLE. On this amendment, I am not certain there is enough time. In any event, 5 minutes.

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield 5 minutes to the Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it seems to me that we should encourage human contacts and discourage transfer of technology and science as benefits to the Soviets.

I have suggested, in the posttrial rhetoric of Ginzburg, Scharansky, Petkus, and others, that perhaps we should reevaluate our participation under the Helsinki Agreement. Perhaps we should reconvene a special session of the 35 signatory countries and take a look at some of the violations of the Soviets. I suppose they can take a look at some of the violations in this country, if there are any. I do not know of any.

However, it seems to me that if we are prepared to receive what probably will be used by the Soviets as a propaganda effort to indicate that we have somehow closed the doors to Soviet officials, if we talk about the right to emigrate and the right to visit, and all the rights that are in the Helsinki Agreement, we have made every effort to comply—Congress even set up a Commission for Security and Cooperation in Europe, of which this Senator is privileged to be a member. We have tried to undertake a most comprehensive review of the compliance of various nations with the Helsinki Agreement, and we have published volumes showing conclusively that human rights are violated systematically and routinely in the nations of Eastern Europe, most frequently in the Soviet Union. But the Commission for Security and Cooperation in Europe did not confine its review to the other nations that signed the agreement. It also examined our compliance. In its report of September 23, 1977, containing its findings and recommendations, one of the few American violations of the Helsinki Final Act that the Commission could find was in our policy toward the processing of visa applications for Communist labor union representatives.

This procedure in no way points to a policy of human rights violations in our country. It was one of only a few instances in which we were less than perfect in our compliance, and Congress acted last year to correct it.

It seems to me that if we place ourselves in a position of matching them in noncompliance, unless and until we consult with our allies with whom we signed the agreement, in effect, we may be undermining our support of the Helsinki Final Act. In fact, we may be charged with a violation of the act itself. Certainly, it is a politically expedient thing to do, from the standpoint of our own domestic political situation: Prolabor, anti-Communist. But in a broader sense, it may be antihuman rights. I would like to pose this question to the distinguished minority leader: Does he understand the amendment to diminish in any way the impact and the support of this Nation and the support of former President Ford for the Helsinki Final Act, signed in August 1975? Despite all the criticism of that act and despite the frustration with the Soviets, and despite the frustration with other Warsaw Pact countries, it seems to some of us—at least, those of us who serve on that Commission—that it has served a purpose. The distinguished Senator from New Jersey is the senior Republican member of that Commission.

I certainly understand the good intentions of the distinguished minority leader. If he is convinced that this will not do violence to our participation or our intentions under that agreement, it would have an impact on how the Senator from Kansas might vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The 5 minutes of the Senator from Kansas have expired.

Mr. BAKER. I yield myself 2 minutes, in order to have this colloquy with the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

It is a very good question, and the one most often put. Does this, in fact, represent a retreat from or a running away from the Helsinki Final Act? To me, it does not. Obviously and clearly, this deals with a procedural matter. That is to say, under the law as it existed before the McGovern amendment, the Secretary of State had the authority, in his discretion, to decide to grant or to refuse to grant a temporary visa for a member of a Communist labor organization or any other category of classification. Under the McGovern amendment, the discretion of the Secretary of State is removed, and that application must automatically be granted by the Secretary of State, subject to the discretionary approval of the Attorney General.

The key and operative aspects of this issue are whether or not there is some discriminatory effort against the free movement, free travel, free emigration of people from one country to the other. The answer is that we are giving more discretion rather than less. We are simply reinstituting the procedural step allowing the Secretary of State to make a discretionary judgment, not just the Attorney General on his own.

I do not believe this represents a retreat from our commitment to the Helsinki Final Act. I think it represents an improvement in the procedural aspects of dealing with temporary visa applications.

Mr. DOLE. It seems to me that we have to adhere to our bargain. It may be distasteful; it may be unpopular. We signed the agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's 2 minutes have expired.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota contribute to this colloquy?

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, how much time do I have remaining?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield 2 additional minutes.

Mr. DOLE. The only point the Senator from Kansas makes, as a member of the Commission for Security And Cooperation in Europe, is that we have had a lot of discussion in the past 3 or 4 weeks.

We have had meetings with Mrs. Scharansky. We tried to figure out some way we might have an impact on Soviet thinking. There are even talks now even of some exchange of prisoners. I do not want to do anything that might upset that possibility. I have completely disapproved of the Soviet actions, and I feel that the Senator from Tennessee is willing to send them a message to at least let them understand that we understand in this country the severity of the trials of Ginzburg, Scharansky, Petkus, Orlov, and all the others.

But I wish to make certain we are moving in the right direction. That is why I have taken this time to raise the question, because it seems to me that we are in some ways at least stretching the limits of the Helsinki Final Act. Maybe we should. Maybe it is time for a reevaluation. Maybe it is time that we pull out. Maybe it is time we abandoned the Commission on Security and Cooperation set up by Congress.

But I am not certain whether now is the time to make that judgment.

I appreciate the Senator's yielding.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I yield myself 5 minutes time.

Mr. President, I think the best way for me to reply to the contention that has been made here by several Senators, that what they want to do in repealing the amendment adopted by Congress last year is to give the Secretary of State more discretion, is to remind them that they are trying to give the Secretary something he does not want and to restore a provision of law that he thinks handicaps his performance as Secretary of State in holding the standard to human rights as effectively as possible.

Let me just read to Senators two or three sentences from Secretary Vance's letter of June 27, just about 30 days ago. He said:

> Since last year the U.S. has been able to use the McGovern Amendment both as a tool to allow a fuller interchange of ideas between journalists and political officials of Western and Eastern countries alike and as an example which we hope others will emulate of our determination to implement the letter of the Helsinki Final Act. This commitment was highlighted at the recent Belgrade follow-up meeting of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, during which members of our delegation referred several times to the McGovern Amendment as the type of provision which other countries should adopt as a means of stimulating a freer flow of persons and ideas.

And then he reminds us:

> In its report on implementation of the Helsinki Final Act, issued on September 23, 1977, the CSCE Commission specifically criticized the U.S. immigration practices which were later amended by the McGovern Amendment as being inconsistent with the Helsinki accord.

And the Secretary concludes on this note:

> For the United States to repeal the McGovern Amendment at this point, when we are criticizing the Soviet Union and Eastern European countries for violations in the human rights field, would be to rob our efforts of force and credibility.

So, Mr. President, the Secretary of State is not asking for the kind of discussion that is being forced on him against his will be the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee.

I wish the distinguished Senator from New York were here in the Chamber. He spoke to us eloquently about all of the human rights violations in the Soviet Union, and I fully subscribe to practically everything he said. But how that leads to the strange conclusion that because the Soviet Union is violating human rights we are going to weaken our own stance on human rights is beyond my comprehension.

The action of the Senate last year was no concession to the Soviet Union. We were not trying to please anyone in the Soviet Union when we struck down a provision in our own law for which we were being criticized all over the world as a feature of our law that was against the free movement of peoples and ideas. And while it may be difficult to influence the course of human rights in the Soviet Union the worldwide competition is still on, and the language that we are talking about here today, as well as our immigration laws as a whole, were not written for the Soviet Union. They were written to deal with the problems that face us worldwide in some 150 different countries.

To listen to some of the debate here in the Chamber today one would think that American immigration laws relate only to our relations with the Soviet Union. If one looks at the 40-some people who have visited the United States under the terms of the so-called McGovern amendment during the last year, and only 40 have come in under the authority that it provides, only 7 of them came from the Soviet Union. The remainder of them represent countries all over the globe with which we have enjoyed very good relations.

In my judgment, to undo the constructive work we did last year, which was within the spirit of the Helsinki Agreements, is to make ourselves look foolish in the eyes of the world, and I very much hope, Mr. President, that we will not be so insecure in this country and so lacking in confidence in the value of our own ideals and our own commitment to freedom that we are afraid to test that with an immigration policy that says to the Secretary of State he should not deny a visa purely on the grounds of the applicant's affiliation with a political organization.

As I said here earlier in the Chamber, the only way I can think for the Soviets, if that is the main concern here, to counter that kind of provision would be for them to automatically deny visa applications of anyone from the outside who is a capitalist, a Democrat, or a Republican, in other words, a purely ideological decision that a visa applicant should be denied the opportunity to visit another country, because we object to his political affiliation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. President, under our immigration laws, there are still 31 criteria under which the Secretary of State and the Attorney General can reject visa applications. Anyone who is perceived as a threat to the security of the United States, for whatever reason, can be denied a visa. Anyone who is identified as a spy, a criminal, or a terrorist, or anything is in his background that constitutes any conceivable threat to the security interests of the United States, can be denied a visa without regard to what we do on this so-called amendment.

I hope the Senator's amendment will be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The additional 1 minute of the Senator has expired.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Dakota yield?

Mr. McGOVERN. I yield myself 1 additional minute for the purpose of responding to the Senator.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. As I understand it, the Secretary of State does not wish to have this discretionary power restored to him; is that correct?

Mr. McGOVERN. That is correct. He says it undercuts our efforts in holding the standard for human rights up to the rest of the world.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. And there was a resolution adopted, as I understand it, by the North Atlantic Assembly praising the United States at the time that the McGovern amendment was adopted. Is that not so?

Mr. McGOVERN. That is correct. All of our NATO allies joined in praising the action here in the Senate and in the House of Representatives and signed by the President last year.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I think for the benefit of the Members I should read from that resolution. Has that resolution been introduced into the RECORD?

Mr. McGOVERN. I did ask it be printed in the RECORD, but I think it might be useful for the Senator to read it.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I think it would be helpful. This is a resolution adopted by the North Atlantic Assembly. It is a resolution on the Helsinki principles and visa policies. It says:

The Assembly,

Recognizing the fundamental validity of the principles set forth in the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe, signed in August 1975 at Helsinki, and in particular those principles relating to the free movement of people and ideas;

Noting with approval the steps taken by NATO member countries to comply more fully with the principles of the Final Act, and in particular the recent legislative initiative of the United States in removing from United States visa policy exclusion solely on the basis of political or organization affiliation;

Expresses hope that such exemplary efforts at compliance with the Helsinki principles by the NATO and other Western countries will promote increased compliance by Warsaw Pact signatories of the Final Act.

So here we find a recognition on the part of the NATO Assembly that the act on the part of the United States in removing the discretionary power of the State Department was an act in compliance with the Helsinki Agreement. So I think what the Senator from South Dakota is trying to say is looked upon and agreed to by the NATO countries that to try to restore this discretionary power to the Secretary of State would be a step backward indeed. I support the Senator in his position.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time of the Senator from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, will the distinguished Senator yield 2 minutes?

Mr. BAKER. How much time remains to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 3 minutes.

Mr. BAKER. I yield 2 of those 3 minutes to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. I appreciate the courtesy of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. President, I am a cosponsor, and am pleased to be a cosponsor of the amendment by the Senator from Tennessee. It would restore discretion in the Secretary of State in determining whether officials of the Soviet Union or the Warsaw Pact nations should be recommended for entry into the United States.

Today I had the privilege of having a discussion at some length with one of the high-level officials in the executive branch of the Government, an official who has been in a field where he has had close contact with the Soviet Union for the past 20 years.

I posed the question to him as to whether the Soviet Union still had the desire and the intention of communizing the entire world. He replied without hesitation that, yes, they did intend to do that if they could by peaceful means.

He had some reservations as to whether they would face the threat of atomic warfare in order to dominate the world.

I say we should consider the type of nation we are dealing with and should grant the discretion to our Secretary of State to make a determination as to whether a Soviet official should be permitted entry into this country.

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I support this amendment by the distinguished minority leader which will restore to the Secretary of State the duty of approving or disapproving the application for non-immigrant visas by any alien who is excludible from the United States by reason of membership in or affiliation with a proscribed organization. The McGovern amendment to the 1977 State Department authorization bill was passed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee with the clear understanding, as written in the committee report, that the purpose of this section was to apply to visits by Euro-Communist leaders and Communist labor leaders in order to facilitate U.S. compliance with the Helsinki Agreement. The effect of this amendment was to shift the presumption in these cases from inadmissibility to admissibility and the Secretary of State was effectively removed from this process of determining admissibility unless there was a threat to the security of the United States caused by the admission of any nonimmigrant.

One example of the abuse which this amendment has caused to its original intent is the fact that members of the Palestine Liberation Organization have been admitted to the United States specifically because of the so-called McGovern amendment. The head of the PLO's Washington office was admitted to this country even though he is a member of a proscribed organization specifically because the McGovern amendment allowed a presumption of admissibility to every person affiliated with any proscribed organization, including the PLO.

I wish to insert for the RECORD a copy of the press briefing paper of the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs of the State Department which specifically confirms this fact.

Even though the McGovern amendment has been modified this year, the modification still allows members of proscribed organizations who have no criminal record or participation in terrorist activities to be admissible into the United States. I do not believe that this was the intent of the original law and this aberration needs to be eliminated. The best way to handle this is to restore to the Secretary of State the duty of justifying the admission into this country of members of proscribed organizations. I urge the passage of this amendment.

The press briefing follows:

PLO MEMBERS ENTRY INTO UNITED STATES

Q. Do you know whether a PLO office is to be opened in Washington?

A. We have no information that the PLO is planning to open the information office which was registered with the Justice Department last year.

Q. Have any PLO officials made an attempt to come to the United States?

A. One request was pending at the time the President signed into law August 17 the State Department Authorization Bill, which includes an amendment mandating changes in the way we deal with visa cases of persons ineligible for visas solely because of their affiliation with a proscribed organization. (Exact language of the amendment is available in the office).

A decision has not been reached on whether to recommend a waiver to allow the travel of this person to the United States.

I have no more details to give you at this time.

Q. Did he apply to come to Washington to open the PLO office in Washington?

A. No.

Q. It is true that PLO members can now be admitted to the United States under the new law, regardless of their membership in this "terrorist" organization? (OR ANY SUCH QUESTION ABOUT THE NEW LAW)

A. The State Department Authorization Bill, which the President signed August 17, includes an amendment mandating changes in the way we deal with visa cases of persons ineligible for visas solely because of their affiliation with proscribed organizations. (Exact language of the amendment is available in the office.)

As the amendment makes clear, this new law is aimed at fuller U.S. compliance with the Helsinki Accord. In that spirit, it was aimed at allowing others with whose views we disagreed more open access to our society.

The law, however, does not change the fact that there are proscribed organizations, including the PLO. As in the past, all requests by members or representatives of such organizations for visas to travel to the United States will be examined on a case-by-case basis.

No terrorists or persons bent on sabotage will be allowed into the United States under this law.

There is a presumption in the new law that the Secretary of State will recommend to the Attorney General that a waiver be granted to persons affiliated with proscribed organizations, including the PLO, unless it is determined that their admission "would be contrary to the security interests of the United States."

As I have said, all visa applications will be carefully examined on a case-by-case basis.

Q. Isn't the State Department interpretation a clear political signal to the Israelis which comes on the heels of the Department's willingness to talk to the PLO if the PLO accepts 242?

A. No, the new law was a Congressional initiative and it enjoyed wide support on the Hill. In the spirit of the Helsinki Accords, it was aimed at allowing others with whose views we disagreed more open access to our society. Visa applications from members of the PLO will be treated the same as those from members of other proscribed organizations.

Q. Does this mean you will allow the PLO to open an Information Office in Washington?

A. Under our law, a foreign organization can register with the Justice Department its intention to open such an office, and it can operate such an office in Washington as long as it observes our laws and makes periodic reports of its activities and financial disbursements.

The PLO in fact registered its intention to open an office with the Justice Department last year, although we understand an office has not yet been opened.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has 1 minute.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have nothing further to say. I thank those who have cosponsored and supported the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

I yield back the remainder of my time and I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, I move to table the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Were the yeas and nays ordered on the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There was a sufficient second and the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HELMS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the tabling motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having expired, the question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from South Dakota to lay on the table Mr. BAKER's amendment (UP 1513). The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

(Mr. EAGLETON assumed the chair.)

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 50, as follows:

Mr. TOWER. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1514

(Purpose: To express the sense of the Congress with respect to the withdrawal of United States ground forces from the Republic of Korea)

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk on behalf of myself and Senators GLENN, NUNN, BAKER, DANFORTH, JAVITS, LUGAR, GRIFFIN, SCHMITT, MORGAN, GOLDWATER, BARTLETT, JOHNSTON, HAYAKAWA, STEVENS, GARN, TOWER, BROOKE, THURMOND, CANNON, CHILES, CASE, McINTYRE, and HELMS, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), for himself and Mr. BAKER, Mr. DANFORTH, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. LUGAR, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. SCHMITT, Mr. MORGAN, Mr. GOLDWATER, Mr. BARTLETT, Mr. JOHNSTON, Mr. HAYAKAWA, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. GARN, Mr. CANNON, Mr. GLENN, Mr. NUNN, Mr. TOWER, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. THURMOND, Mr. CHILES, Mr. CASE, Mr. McINTYRE, and Mr. HELMS, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1514.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

POLICY ON THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

SEC. 26. It is the sense of the Congress that further withdrawal of ground forces of the United States from the Republic of Korea may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair ask the Senator from Illinois a question? Is this the amendment on which there is a 2-hour time limitation?

Mr. PERCY. That is correct, Mr. President. Because Senators JAVITS, NUNN, GLENN, and myself have worked out a uniform amendment, I would think we could cut that time to a minimum of an hour, and hopefully less than that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is a 2-hour limitation on this amendment.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, in March 1977, President Carter announced his decision to withdraw 28,000 U.S. ground forces from South Korea by 1982. The first elements are already being withdrawn.

Over the past year I have come to doubt very seriously the wisdom of the President's decision. Because the Carter administration's troop withdrawal plan threatens to upset the precarious military balance on the Korean peninsula, and because the current withdrawal program undermines the credibility of U.S. security commitments in the eyes of our Asian allies, I have concluded that the present policy is unwise. I therefore, offer an amendment to the International Security Assistance Act of 1978 expressing the sense of the Congress that the further withdrawal of U.S. ground troops from South Korea may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress.

In May of this year, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown warned in testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that "North Korean military capabilities pose a real threat to South Korea." North Korean President Kim Il-Sung on many occasions has called for national reunification, and a careful reading of his statements shows that he unmistakably means reunification under the Communist North. In 1975, Kim Il-Sung stated in Peking:

If revolution takes place in South Korea, we as one and the same nation, will not just look at it with folded arms, but will strongly support the South Korean people. If the enemy ignites war recklessly we shall resolutely answer it with war and completely destroy the oppressors. In this war we will only lose the military demarcation line and will gain the country's reunification.

Could anyone doubt the sincerity, the clarity, the straightforwardness, and the intention of Kim Il Sung in the North when he makes those statements?

Is there anyone who can point to the slightest bit of evidence that the intentions of the North Koreans to unite under communism the entire Korean Peninsula has changed one iota?

I doubt it.

In fact, there is not any evidence, not a shred of it.

Moreover, Kim Il Sung has made clear his intent by actions as well as words. Over the last decade the North Koreans have committed numerous provocative acts endangering peace and stability in Korea. From 1966 to 1969, the North infiltrated hundreds of agents into the South with the aim of fomenting an insurgency. In early 1968, North Korean commandos attempted to assassinate South Korean President Park Chung Hee. Soon after, North Korean forces illegally seized the Pueblo in international waters. In 1969, the North Koreans shot down a U.S. EC–121 reconnaissance aircraft. In late 1974 and early 1975, two tunnels, intended to facilitate the infiltration of North Korean troops behind South Korean defensive lines, were discovered in the demilitarized zone. In August 1976, two U.S. officers were brutally murdered by North Korean soldiers while trimming a tree at the Panmunjom truce site. Just a year ago, North Korean gunfire downed a U.S. helicopter which had unintentionally strayed across the demilitarized zone. Three Americans were killed and one survivor was returned to the United States.

In adidtion to repeated expressions of aggressive intent and a history of provocative acts, the growth in North Korean military capabilities over the past 10 years constitutes the most ominous threat to the security of South Korea's borders. Presidential Review Memorandum (PRM) 10, a comprehensive interagency study which has been widely discussed and quoted in the press, concludes that—

The level of forces which could be brought to bear at the front of D–Day would generally favor North Korea over the ROK (Republic of Korea) in all categories.

That is from a press report directly quoting the Presidential Review Memorandum No. 10.

Indeed, North Korea's continued buildup and modernization of its forces has shifted the Korean military balance from parity in firepower in 1970 to a definite advantage for the North today. North Koreans maintain a 2-to-1 advantage in armored forces, artillery, and tactical aircraft. They enjoy a favorable margin of 4 to 1 in navy combat vessels. In addition, they possess significant advantages in air defenses and commando forces. Finally, North Korea has almost overcome the South's advantage in active duty manpower.

Compounding this quantitative superiority in the static indicators of offensive capabilities are the structure and positioning of the North Korean army and air units which give it the ability to attack the South with a minimum of warning. And, according to Presidential Review Memorandum 10:

If the North Koreans were to achieve tactical surprise, it is possible that they could at least temporarily attain their most likely major objective—the capture of Seoul.

Seoul is just some 24 miles from the DMZ.

If, in a relatively few hours, Seoul should fall after a surprise attack, is there anyone who would maintain that South Korea could stand up against the fall of its capital? We know the problems involved in that country. The best assessment the Senator from Illinois can get is that with the fall of Seoul, so goes South Korea.

As stated above, the military balance on the Korean Peninsula is precarious. What, then, stabilizes the military situation in Korea? Certainly the presence of the U.S. 2d Infantry Division between the demilitarized zone and Seoul must be counted as a critical deterrent to North Korean aggression. Many believe that the stationing of U.S. ground combat forces in Korea has been the single most important factor in preventing war in Korea. Gen. John Vessey, Commander of U.S. Forces Korea, believes that a military balance today exists on the Korean Peninsula because of the U.S. troop presence there. At the most fundamental level, U.S. ground forces bolster deterrence by augmenting the firepower of South Korean forces. Even more important, though, they create a significant psychological deterrent by demonstrating that a U.S. response to North Korean aggression would be automatic.

Besides deterring North Korean attack, U.S. ground forces also serve to restrain South Korean response to provocative incidents engineered by the North, thus dampening tension on the peninsula. A recent report on U.S. troop withdrawal policy written by the late Senator Humphrey and Senator GLENN concludes that without U.S. ground forces in Korea, deterrence would be weakened and the risk of war increased. I strongly agree with that assessment.

I would say that any Member of the Senate who has any doubt about that should read what both Senators NUNN and GLENN have said about this matter—both of them extraordinarily knowledgeable, both of them penetrating in their questions of State and Defense Department witnesses and other representatives of the administration. And certainly the late Senator Humphrey was very, very articulate in the way he enunciated his deep concern about the possibility of a risk of war once again in Asia over South Korea.

Should war in Korea break out, the consequences for peace and stability would extend beyond the shores of the Korean Peninsula. The security and political interest of four major powers—the United States, the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, and Japan—converge in Korea. Most commentators agree that while the Soviet Union and China publicly support Kim Il-Sung's call for the withdrawal of U.S. troops, the two powers are, in fact, favorably inclined toward the U.S. security commitment and troop presence as a stabilizing factor in a volatile region. Although the Soviet Union and China apparently favor continued relaxation of tensions with the United States over support for Kim Il-Sung's more aggressive designs, it is difficult to see how either nation could avoid siding with North Korea in the event of war.

Furthermore, should the Soviets or Chinese conclude that the U.S. commitment to South Korea's defense had significantly weakened, their interest in stability and preservation of the status quo on the peninsula might diminish. This might be especially true in the case of the Soviet Union. Relations between the Soviet Union and North Korea have improved over the last 18 months. Early this year, North Korean President Kim Il-Sung received the Order of Lenin, one of the Soviet Union's highest decorations. Given an improvement in relations, and given recent Soviet behavior elsewhere in the world (for example, Africa), U.S. ground force withdrawal from South Korea now might be conducive to Soviet-supported North Korean adventurism later.

United States troop withdrawal, then, by increasing the risk of war in Korea, concomitantly raises the larger danger of great power confrontation.

Similarly, North Korean attempts to reunify Korea by military means would threaten Japan. A unified, Communist Korea would give new meaning to the old cliché that the peninsula is a "dagger pointed at the heart of Japan." Japanese trust in the U.S. commitment to the defense of their country would be drastically diminished. Japan might even feel sufficiently threatened to initiate a massive rearmament program. A rearmed Japan, with offensive capability might cause concern in East Asia.

Mr. President and my distinguished colleagues, I have been so concerned about this matter for the last 3 or 4 years that I have spent some time at the U.N., talking with diplomats there. The Senator from Illinois has talked with representatives from Japan, Indonesia, New Zealand, and Australia. There is no shadow of doubt that there is a feeling on their part that this symbol may be a symbol to the rest of the world and to the Pacific that the United States is lessening its interest. It was necessary for the Secretary of Defense, at a very critical time in many of the relationships and problems confronting a new administration, to take time out to go to the Pacific to attempt to reassure our allies and friends. Try as he could—and certainly, Harold Brown's capacity and capability is highly regarded by the Senator from Illinois—I did not feel that the assurance was adequate. The assurance that we intend to maintain a deep interest in this area is symbolized by the presence of our Armed Forces. And certainly, the deep concern of the many sponsors of this amendment is that there may be a risk so serious and so great that consultation with the Congress of the United States prior to further withdrawals is required in the national security interest of the United States.

It is clear that from a military perspective, the proposed U.S. policy of withdrawing ground troops from South Korea is fundamentally unsound. To add to its flaws, we should note that its grave shortcomings are to some extent attributable to the manner in which the policy was conceived. Extensive hearings recently held by a subcommittee of the House Armed Services Committee revealed that the President's decision to withdraw troops from South Korea was largely the result of a pledge made in the heat of the 1976 campaign. The House subcommittee found that the President did not seek the advice of senior military officials on the wisdom of withdrawal per se, but instead required only that they devise the best possible arrangements for withdrawal.

In addition to the dangerous military implications of a U.S. ground troop pullout from Korea, the current withdrawal policy undermines the credibility of our security commitments to our other Asian allies. No serious consultation with our Asian allies, particularly the South Koreans and the Japanese, preceded announcement of the President's decision to withdraw troops.

When the plans met with substantial criticism in East Asia, administration officials sought to reassure our allies that the United States would remain a power in Asia and the Pacific and maintain the defense commitment to South Korea. But, to these nations, our actions speak louder than our words.

Many Asian leaders express uncertainty and continued anxiety with regard to U.S. Asian policy. Some fear that withdrawal from Korea may signal a larger U.S. withdrawal from Asia as a whole. South Korean officials continue privately to oppose the withdrawal policy. Their confidence in the U.S. commitment is low. The Japanese now reluctantly accept the President's decision as a fait accompli, while hoping that the "compensatory measures" promised the South Koreans by the United States, coupled with U.S. diplomatic initiatives in the area—promotion of bilateral talks between the north and south and action to obtain a commitment to peace on the peninsula by the major powers—will preserve stability in northeast Asia.

Inconsistencies in the troop withdrawal policy have been especially damaging to continued Japanese and South Korean trust in U.S. security guarantees. One of the administration's publicly enunciated rationales for withdrawal of U.S. ground troops is belief that the South Koreans could defend themselves from a North Korean attack. Yet PRM 10 argues that the North, under the right circumstances, is capable of launching a surprise attack and capturing Seoul. The President has sought to substitute reaffirmation of the U.S. commitment to South Korea's defense for the deployment of U.S. ground troops on Korean soil. PRM 13 also quoted in the press argues that a major advantage of withdrawal is that it precludes the danger of U.S. forces being brought automatically into any eventual fighting. This indicates to free Asia that the U.S. commitment is by no means assured. Such inconsistencies between public pronouncements and reality create a "credibility gap" which corrodes good relations between the United States and its Asian allies.

Clearly, then, the adverse military and political effects of U.S. ground troop withdrawal from Korea do not commend current policy. For the reasons I have detailed, I urge that the Senate express the opinion that further troop withdrawal may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress.

Mr. President, in order to save the time of my colleagues this evening at this late hour, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at this point quotations from my distinguished colleagues who are the principal cosponsors of this amendment, Senator GLENN and Senator NUNN.

Also, a discerning comment and commentary made by the distinguished Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS).

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM SENATE FOREIGN RELATIONS COMMITTEE MEETING, MAY 1, 1978

Senator GLENN. I fully support congressional action, as you know from our private conversations in this regard, Mr. Secretary. I will work to see that we live up to what I look upon as being reneging on our part at the present time.

This whole view that somehow we are maintaining a balance when we are so unbalanced already, as your statement indicates, is peculiar, especially since we are further unbalancing that, even if we withdraw only one battalion.

Mr. Secretary, the threat is on the ground, down the Kaesong Corridor, primarily, with which you are familiar, of course.

I grant you that is good defensive terrain.

With the massive fire power and tank massing capability of the North, with their river crossing equipment, with the tunnels they have dug under the Demilitarized Zone—I don't know that we even know for sure how many might have been dug which we have not yet located—these all put a real premium on that area. I think you very correctly state that you cannot equate one type of weapon system directly with another.

I know there has been much comment from the Department of Defense about our assigning 12 additional F-4's to that area. But with the primary threat being down the Kaesong corridor, I am sure we would all agree we cannot park F-4's in the Kaesong corridor and have them do any good. In any period of bad weather when they would not be brought to bear in that area, they would not be very useful against a massed attack down that Kaesong corridor.

This is particularly crucial, too, in that this is not the usual type of situation we would run into in Europe, for example, or some other place in the world where we might be involved in combat, in that the enemy is only some 26 miles away. It doesn't take much of a move to put Seoul within the range of artillery.

Our defense posture in that area has been changed drastically in the past few years. At one time, before Seoul became the major metropolitan center it now is, the plan in Korea was to withdraw down the peninsula in any major attack, regroup, reattack, and come back north again. After Seoul got much of its population and became the heart of the manufacturing and the economy of almost all of Korea, we decided to change that, as we are all aware, and make the defense of Seoul the military posture for all of the forces, including ours, in South Korea. Seoul could not be allowed to fall.

BASIS FOR WITHDRAWAL QUESTIONED

That is the reason why this very short distance and the balance of forces should play such an important role in our thinking. When most of us view the preponderance in military power as already being in favor of the North, to start withdrawals because of some previous promise is not right to me. I think we should be making these withdrawals strictly on the basis of combat capability of the South to take over.

I have yet to hear anything that would refute that. I think to set up some arbitrary time schedule on our part and say, yes, we are now going to adhere to this time schedule, but as time goes along, we will withdraw fewer numbers, perhaps, as those due dates come up, does not make any sense in a military situation. We should be making our withdrawals on the basis of the ability of the South Koreans to take over and maintain that military balance.

I have yet to hear anything, either this morning or at any other time in the recent past since the decision at the White House, that would refute that. It is commonsense to me that we maintain a combat balance there. Anything short of that would encourage the North to go adventuring.

LOGIC OF WITHDRAWAL QUESTIONED

It is difficult for me to see, Mr. Secretary, how it is met when we say the North has military superiority now and yet we are withdrawing some of our defense capability in the South and that somehow we are thereby improving our posture in Korea. That rather defies logic.

POSSIBILITY OF ENCOURAGING SOUTH KOREAN NUCLEAR WEAPONS DEVELOPMENT

Do you think this will encourage South Korea to develop its own nuclear weapons?

Secretary BROWN. I think the South Koreans are aware that they remain under the nuclear umbrella of the United States and therefore this action will not precipitate any such action on their part.

Senator GLENN. I certainly hope you are right.

However, on March 29, the National Unification Board urged the development of "nuclear strength" to change North Korean policy to peaceful coexistence.

I think that would be an extremely dangerous development in Northeast Asia if they move ahead with that.

Why was our withdrawal and the announcement of it and our execution of it not tied to some reciprocal action from the North?

Why did we peremptorily decide this was the way we were going to go? Could we not have used this as leverage to get the North at least to talk to South Korea or to get some meeting at whatever levels of government would have been appropriate as a quid pro quo to what we were doing?

Secretary BROWN. That is a matter of judgment, Senator Glenn. I think that the existence of this overall plan for withdrawal does provide a framework which, in its own way, puts some pressure on the North Koreans. I think that one value of working toward a situation in which the South Koreans depend less on what will still be a very firm commitment by the United States to maintain South Korean security in conjunction with South Korea, is that the prospect of a South Korean situation less dependent upon the presence of U.S. forces does have a chance—though I am not saying it will happen—of making the North Koreans think about whether they don't want to get involved in discussions now. Whether they will, I don't know. But it does move the situation forward and does put some pressure on the North Koreans to engage in discussions with the South Koreans and ourselves.

Senator GLENN. I would tend to think of it in somewhat the opposite vein: the more we go ahead with our own preset schedule with our No. 1 emphasis not being on combat capability, the longer they wait, the better posture they will find themselves in. So why talk? Why negotiate now? Why try to get both sides together so long as they are getting an advantage by our reducing the combat capability in the South?

FROM DEBATE ON DEFENSE PROCUREMENT BILL, JULY 10, 1978

Mr. NUNN. I say to the distinguished Senator from Kansas that the Armed Services Committee does not have jurisdiction over all those matters. We try to pinpoint primarily the military analysis, but the only way that military analysis can be arrived at is by considering the items that the Senator from Kansas has enumerated in terms of our foreign policy.

I anticipate that DOD would be ready to answer those questions or, if not, the State Department would be ready to answer those questions when the report is submitted, or at the appropriate hearings of the Armed Services Committee or the Foreign Relations Committee.

Let me add that I am particularly concerned, as an individual Senator, as to the North Korean reaction to the announced U.S. withdrawal plans.

I am interested in the North Korean reaction to the withdrawal which has already occurred and the withdrawal which will occur this year.

As the Senator from Georgia has already enumerated, approximately 2,600 troops have been withdrawn.

I am not personally opposed to withdrawing some troops from South Korea, but I am gravely concerned there is no quid pro quo involved in this situation. I am gravely concerned that the North Koreans may not react as we would hope they would react. If they, for instance, were to undertake a military buildup while we were withdrawing, then I certainly think that is a relevant matter for Congress and hopefully the executive branch to consider in determining whether the plans will be completed and carried out. If they were to begin a reduction of their military forces, then that would put the matter in an entirely different light.

So all these matters certainly are very relevant in terms of making a rational determination of the future as to a congressional response to whatever the administration's plan may evolve into.

As I have said before, Mr. President, we have been far more successful in our post-World War II alliances, as I see it, in the NATO and European area of the world than we have in the Pacific, though that is no discredit to what we have done there. But the outcome of success has certainly not been equal to what it has been in the NATO area.

KOREA

Last year the President announced that he intended to withdraw U.S. ground combat troops from Korea over a period of years. The Armed Services Committee in its report has recommended that no further withdrawals be made until the Secretary of Defense provides a report detailing the effects of such withdrawal on the delicate deterrent balance in Korea and on the political and military situation in the Far East. There are a number of unresolved problems in the President's withdrawal plan, and the committee is greatly concerned that they have not yet been fully analyzed. It therefore recommends that a very cautious approach be taken.

This is an executive function, but it is also a highly important legislative function, particularly as it pertains to a treaty that has been made years ago and approved by this body. And when we say Korea, I am thinking in terms of the entire Pacific area—the entire Pacific problem, so to speak—where we have found that, with the situation being left open, the Communists very rapidly come in, and we have had these two wars, now, since the end of World War II, in that area of the world. Unless we intend to really quit, withdraw, and come out and stay out, I am not willing, in my judgment, to go to withdrawing our troops until some provision is made to have the effect, the deterrent effect of our presence there, and in other areas of the Pacific also. Personally, I do not know of a better place to keep them now than in Korea. We have limited this matter and about whittled it down to that point. I have not been shown any facts whereby we could better our position or save any money, really, by withdrawing those forces from Korea.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further hypothetical questions that might be placed on this policy and answers be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Q. The Senate just debated Korea troop withdrawals during debate on the defense procurement bill. Do we need to pass this amendment as well?

A. Yes. The section on Korea in the Committee report on the defense bill requires that the Secretary of Defense provide an analysis to the committee before any future withdrawal of ground combat troops. The analysis must discuss a number of points including the effect of any proposed withdrawal plan on preserving deterrence in Korea; the reaction anticipated from North Korea; and the effect of the plan on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent. Essentially, the section is a reporting requirement. And I think it is a good reporting requirement—the Armed Services Committee and the Senate should have these facts reviewed. That is why I have agreed to accept Senator NUNN's modification to my amendment.

The Security Assistance Bill that we have before us today also contains reporting requirements on the South Korean troop withdrawals. A section added by Senator GLENN requires the President to transmit 120 days prior to each planned phase of troop withdrawal a report evaluating the feasibility of continued U.S. withdrawal. This is also an excellent addition and I support it wholeheartedly.

My amendment expresses the sense of the Senate that the troop withdrawal policy may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region The Senate Foreign Relations Committee has received reports. It has heard testimony. Two of its members wrote an excellent analysis of the troop withdrawal policy. On the basis of these reports already received, I can say without reading one more report that the troop withdrawal policy is wrong.

Q. Didn't President Carter recently announce a slowdown in the troop withdrawals? Was this a significant change in the policy?

A. Yes to the first question. No to the second. The administration postponed until next year withdrawing some combat troops that were intended to come out this year. The administration, however, has not announced a change in the overall plan of withdrawing the remaining ground combat groups over the next four to five years.

On December 31, 1977, there were about 40,000 U.S. military personnel in Korea, including 32,000 Army troops. The original plan proposed the withdrawal of 6,000 ground troops by December 1978 and the withdrawal of the remaining ground combat units over the next four or five years. Of that 6,000, about 2,600 are in service or support activities and have already been withdrawn or are scheduled to be withdrawn this summer or fall. The principal concern was over 3,400 troops including mostly combat troops scheduled for withdrawal in December 1978. Last April, the President announced his decision to defer the scheduled withdrawal of U.S. combat troops in Korea except for one battalion. This meant that only 800 combat troops would be withdrawn by the end of this year. Current plans call for those troops previously scheduled for withdrawal this year to be withdrawn in 1979.

Q. The administration argues that the South Korean economy is strong and that South Korea should take over fully its own defense burden. The administration also believes that with military aid and equipment transfers, a military balance between the North and the South can be achieved. How do you answer these arguments?

A. My answer to those arguments is—why take the risk? Troop withdrawal saves the U.S. no money. It probably does not buy us any flexibility either, because about 12,000 U.S. personnel are scheduled to remain in South Korea after the ground combat troop withdrawal according to the President's plan—virtually guaranteeing immediate and substantial U.S. casualties in the event of another conflict on the Korean Peninsula. The withdrawal reduces the deterrent to the North, it weakens the firepower of the South, and it has brought into question the U.S. commitment to stability on the Korea peninsula. The policy achieves nothing for the United States. It could cause great damage. My question is why take the risk?

Q. An amendment was passed to the State Department Authorization Act last year calling for consultation on this issue. What has changed since last year?

A. In June 1977, the Senate did debate the troop withdrawal question. Some Senators wanted to pass an amendment approving the troop withdrawals. Other Senators wanted to pass an amendment opposing the troop withdrawals. Senator Byrd introduced—and obtained a majority of those voting—for a compromise statement. The legislation that finally passed declared that U.S. policy toward South Korea should "continue to be arrived at by joint decision of the President and Congress." It also stated that the implementation of the President's policy should be "carried out in regular consultation with Congress."

The administration has consulted with us during the past year. I congratulate the administration for its frank and open consultation with the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

The material and information I have seen since last year's debate, much coming from the administration, has reaffirmed my belief that the troops withdrawal policy is ill-advised. Since we considered this issue last year we have seen the following:

In his May 1, 1978, testimony before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown said the following:

"Despite its growing economic superiority, South Korea has not yet caught up militarily with the North. North Korean military capabilities pose a real threat to South Korea."

According to a State Department report received by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee late last year:

"North Korea continues to threaten the stability of the region . . . The North Koreans are well equipped for an offensive war. The proximity of Seoul to the Demilitarized Zone would be an advantage for the Northern forces, particularly if they were able to achieve surprise."

Seoul is approximately 24 miles from the DMZ and the North Korean divisions along the DMZ are in an offensive posture, allowing them to attack almost without warning. The fall of Seoul could precipitate the fall of South Korea.

Senators Humphrey and Glenn wrote a report issued in January 1978 to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in which they stated:

"The presence of U.S. ground forces in South Korea helps to stabilize the military situation in three ways: it provides considerable firepower; it provides for an automatic U.S. response that serves as an important deterrent; and the United States is able to orchestrate trucekeeping operations and restrain any overly zealous South Korean reactions to incidents. Removal of U.S. ground forces will weaken deterrence and to some degree increase the threat of war."

The Congressional Budget Office in a May 1978 report has estimated that we can expect either only modest savings or actual additional expenditures if the troops withdrawn are stationed elsewhere as currently planned. In other words. we get less deterrence at about the same or even greater cost.

Q. Why should we continue to lend security assistance to a regime whose human rights record is so poor?

A. Some human rights groups I have talked with fear that, rather than improving human rights conditions in South Korea, U.S. troop withdrawals would actually make matters worse. I agree.

The withdrawal of American troops is likely to accentuate the atmosphere of crisis in South Korea and lead to still greater tightening of domestic controls. Moreover, by withdrawing our combat presence in the country, we actually would reduce our influence with the government and our opportunities to improve the climate for civil and political freedoms.

Q. The military balance today favors the North. The possibility for future improvement in that balance should not be overlooked. The South Korean government is undertaking a force improvement plan, and the $800 million equipment transfer contained in this bill will go a long way toward righting the balance. Moreover, the United States intends to maintain its Air Force capabilities in South Korea and its naval capabilities offshore. Don't you think this improvement in the balance will allow the United States to withdraw its ground forces?

A. I have seen classified information on the force improvement plan as well as the equipment transfer package. I cannot mention any specifics because they are classified, but I can say that in 1982 when the President plans to withdraw the last U.S. ground combat forces, the firepower imbalance could remain. Even if the North does not improve its forces over the next four years—an assumption that we cannot in reality make—neither the South Korean force improvement plan nor the equipment transfer will right the imbalance in tanks or artillery multiple rocket launchers. The North would still have a significant lead in those two areas, according to current plans.

There are also questions as to the capability of South Korean forces to assume certain functions now performed by U.S. troops. To quote the Humphrey-Glenn report:

". . . in military terms U.S. forces play a relatively larger role now than they did before 1974 in the defense of Seoul, thus making ground troop withdrawal more difficult."

The South Korean forward defense strategy instituted in 1974 under U.S. leadership includes a principal role for U.S. combat forces. While the Administration apparently feels that some of the qualitative differences between U.S. and South Korean forces can be overcome during the four or five years of the withdrawal program, others close to the scene have expressed serious doubts. I am concerned that in the performance of certain defense functions, South Korean troops cannot simply be substituted for Americans.

Moreover, we know that the military balance must take into account more factors than hardware and personnel comparisons. The deterrent provided by U.S. troops cannot be over-estimated in evaluating the current military balance between the North and the South. It may be the one single factor that has prevented North Korea from invading the South during the last 25 years. The administration seems to be willing to concede that factor without gaining anything in return.

Q. What is the present military balance in Korea?

A. As recently as 1970 there was rough parity in the North-South military balance. But the balance has shifted, decidedly in favor of the North Korean forces. The North presently leads in firepower, and the margin of superiority is increasing rapidly. The rough military force comparison is as follows (statistics from the Humphrey-Glenn report):

| | 1970 | | 1977 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | SK | NK | SK | NK |
| Personnel: | | | | |
| Active forces | 634,000 | 400,000 | 600,000 | 520,000 |
| Reserve forces | 1,000,000 | 1,200,000 | 2,800,000 | 1,800,000 |

We see that the active forces of South Korea have actually decreased by 6 percent over the 7 year period, while the size of the North Korean active army has grown by 30 percent.

| | 1970 | | 1977 | |
|---|---|---|---|---|
| | SK | NK | SK | NK |
| Ground balance: | | | | |
| Tanks | 900 | 600 | 1,100 | 1,950 |
| APC (armored personnel carriers) | 300 | 120 | 400 | 750 |
| Assault guns | 0 | 300 | 0 | 105 |
| Shelling capability: | | | | |
| Artillery/multiple rocket launchers | 1,750 | 3,300 | 2,000 | 4,335 |
| Air balance: | | | | |
| Jet combat aircraft | 230 | 555 | 320 | 655 |
| Other military aircraft | 35 | 130 | 200 | 320 |
| AAA guns (anti-aircraft artillery) | 850 | 2,000 | 1,000 | 5,500 |
| Navy combat vessels | 60 | 190 | 90 | 450 |

With firepower we find the same ominous trends. The tank force of the ROK has grown 22%, while that of the North has increased by 225%. The growth rate differential is even more pronounced in the acquisition of armoured personnel carriers.

The North also enjoys a two-to-one advantage in combat jet aircraft, although the two sides have roughly equal numbers of modern fighters. The North has a more than four to one advantage in anti-aircraft guns and navy combat vessels.

North Korea has committed far more resources to developing military-related industries. The North Korean army is structured and positioned to be capable of delivering a massive firepower and shock attack on South Korea. North Korean forces are largely deployed along the DMZ so that a surprise attack could be mounted with little warning.

According to the Humphrey-Glenn report, one particularly worrisome factor is North Korea's significant special warfare capability. Deployed by difficult-to-detect airlift, special forces can infiltrate South Korean rear areas and attack airfields, logistic depots, lines of communications, and command centers. In this event, South Korea will have to divert forces from their primary mission of repelling an attack on the DMZ to counter the special warfare activities of the North.

In short, with the ominous growth of North Korean military capabilities, the presence of U.S. forces becomes ever more important to maintain a rough military balance on the Korean peninsula.

Q. Won't U.S. troop withdrawals produce substantial economic savings?

A. No. Withdrawal of these forces will not save money and will probably result in even greater expenditures than if we left them in Korea.

The Administration has said it intends to reassign the 2nd Division to a different role in our force structure. President Carter indicated in January that the 2nd Division would be used as a reserve for a posssible conflict in the NATO theatre. The Secretary of Defense Annual Report for fiscal 1979 suggests that the 2nd Division would be maintained for possible redeployment to Korea in the event of conflict there. In either case, the need to base, reequip and possibly retrain these troops would require greatly increased expenditures, probably more than a billion additional dollars over the next five years according to the Congressional Budget Office. And these figures do not even include the cost of the compensatory aid package for South Korea already requested by the Administration. The current proposal is to give the South Koreans $800 million worth of arms and equipment that would be left behind by U.S. forces. In addition, the cost of providing additional foreign military sales credits over the next several years would be over $200 million. Coupled with increased technical assistance and the need to add to the capabilities of our remaining forces in Korea, the costs of withdrawing troops are significant indeed.

Q. Are you suggesting that we must keep U.S. troops in South Korea forever? What would have to change for you to support the withdrawal of American forces?

A. Since the Korean War twenty-five years ago, American forces have been playing a peacekeeping function on the Korean peninsula: first, by helping to deter another attack from the North, and second, by acting as a restraining influence in situations that might otherwise have escalated to conflict. I am persuaded that these roles are still crucial. Indeed, the ominous buildup of offensive forces in North Korea in recent years suggests that our presence is required now more than ever.

Several things should happen before the U.S. can safely withdraw forces from South Korea. First, a pull-back or other adjustment of North Korean forces should occur to reduce their potential for a sudden attack on the South. Whether this occurs as a result of negotiations between North and South or by some other means, the dangerous posture of North Korea should be changed. Second, the defensive capabilities of the South should be increased through existing programs of aid and technical assistance in tandem with ongoing South Korean efforts to improve their force structure. Simply handing the entire task back to the South Koreans at this time would be premature. Finally, the general climate or relations between North and South Korea should improve before we remove our immediate military presence from the peninsula. Precipitous withdrawal under present circumstances will only increase the anxieties on both sides and might even lead the South Koreans to seek a nuclear capability to guarantee its security.

In short, I do not favor a neverending U.S. combat presence in South Korea. But I do believe that any change in our posture there should be keyed to favorable developments in the overall military equation. The Administration seems to be ignoring the facts of the situation.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have an amendment to the Percy amendment that I would ask if the Senator would accept, really, as a modification.

We have talked about this. First of all, I would like to say I commend the Senator from Illinois for bringing this very serious matter to the attention of the Senate. For some time now, I have been concerned about the proposed withdrawal. I have been particularly concerned about whether the military balance could be upset in that very crucial region of the world.

Although I am not opposed to eventual withdrawal of some or perhaps all American ground forces from South Korea, I believe that the withdrawal must be contingent on the South Koreans being able to maintain the military balance on the ground and in the air and in the coastal areas surrounding that important part of the world.

I think that contingency not only will have to reflect their military power, but also their ability to supply and support their military forces.

So I feel that is a condition precedent to further withdrawal, and I believe the Senator from Illinois has also expressed that sentiment.

I also feel that when we are dealing with crucial areas of this nature we ought to be very careful to see that we do not throw away the opportunity of perhaps getting some concessions from the North Koreans in exchange for American withdrawal.

I am concerned about the lack of that kind of effort in terms of getting a quid pro quo in having North Koreans reduce the military forces which pose, as the Senator from Illinois already expressed, a very serious threat.

There are a good many other things I am concerned about, including the effect of this withdrawal on our relationship with Japan, the effect on the relationship with China, the Soviet Union, and on the powers whose interests converge in that very important part of the world.

Mr. President, I will not make further remarks. I will simply ask the Senator from Illinois if he would be willing to accept an amendment which does not in any way change—could I have the attention of the Senator from Illinois?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May we have order in the Chamber, please?

Mr. NUNN. I ask the Senator from Illinois if he would be willing to accept a modification of his amendment which does not in any way change his amendment, but would simply add the following words at the end of his language, and I will read my proposed modification:

Prior to any further withdrawal the President should report to the Congress on the effect of any proposed withdrawal plan on preserving deterrence in Korea; the reaction anticipated from North Korea; a consideration of the effect of the plan on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent; the effect of any withdrawal on our long-term military and economic partnership with Japan; the effect of any proposed withdrawal on the United States/Chinese and United States/Soviet military balance; and, the possible implications of any proposed withdrawal on the Soviet/Chinese military situation.

I would like to add that to the Senator's amendment, if he would accept that as a modification.

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois not only accepts the modification to the amendment, but also wishes to express deep appreciation to my distinguished colleague for adding this language which I think adds specificity and strengthens the amendment.

The Senator from Illinois also, at the same time, would like to express deep appreciation to the distinguished Senator, the floor manager of the bill, the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), and my distinguished colleague, the senior Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), who, as always, has been extraordinarily helpful in bringing parties together so that we have a strong unified voice.

I think it is a strong amendment and will serve its purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the modification of the Senator from Illinois' amendment by the modification of the Senator from Georgia?

The Chair hears none.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, this amendment is being offered on behalf of myself, Senator GLENN, and Senator CHILES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please send the modification to the desk.

The amendment is so modified.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

POLICY ON THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

SEC. 26. It is the sense of the Congress that further withdrawal of ground forces of the United States from the Republic of Korea may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress. Prior to any further withdrawal the President should report to the Congress on the effect of any proposed withdrawal plan on preserving deterrence in Korea; the reaction anticipated from North Korea; a consideration of the effect of the plan on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent; the effect of any withdrawal on our long-term military and economic partnership with Japan; the effect of any proposed withdrawal on the United States/Chinese and United States/Soviet military balance; and, the possible implications of any proposed withdrawal on the Soviet/Chinese military situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has had a long concern about the problems of Korea. We have had numerous discussions on the subject.

I, too, have been very concerned about this, and I wrote a letter to the President on April 4, 1978, which I will read portions of, to let the Senator from Illinois know exactly how I feel about this, also. This letter has not been made public until this time:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to express my reservations about proceeding with the proposed withdrawal of the first 6,000 troops from the Republic of Korea in late 1978.

In the current Korean scandal investigation climate, it is highly doubtful that Congress will approve the full transfer legislation this year.

We may wind up doing that, but at that time it looked very doubtful:

Even the consideration of a less than total package this year as an indication of good faith could have the reverse effect in East Asia of inducing even greater skepticism with regard to our reliability for a long-term U.S. commitment.

As you are well aware, the military and political balance on the Korean peninsula and in northeast Asia is fragile. Doubts persist regarding U.S. intentions, not only in Korea, but among other East Asia allies in general, and a precipitous reduction of ground combat personnel in the absence of a Congressionally-approved transfer package will only exacerbate these uncertainties, particularly with regard to Japan.

In other words, I believe it is critical that we not tie our Korean reductions to a no-matter-what, rigid timetable, but rather tie withdrawal to the actual ability of the South Koreans to assume a larger defense load. To do otherwise could invite military action by North Korea, with remaining American forces involvement being minutes, or at best hours, away in an area where advance intelligence information is most inadequate.

It is unfortunate that the Korean scandal investigations in the Congress have occurred at this time, but that could not have been foreseen when withdrawal plans were made. Congressional attempts to force Korean cooperation by threats to withhold the proposed military aid package or deny Export-Import Bank loans for energy development projects, are indeed deplorable and can only work to the long-term detriment of our East Asian policy.

What will be interpreted as U.S. reneging on the promised military aid package is of intense interest not only to Korea, but also to our other East Asian allies who too often put their own erroneous interpretation on our Korean moves as part of a larger general disengagement of American interest from East Asia in the wake of Viet Nam.

In a recent report to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee titled "U.S. Troop Withdrawal from the Republic of Korea", my principle recommendation was:

"1. The Senate should review the military transfer authorization based upon the political-military needs of the area and avoid linking it to the bribery scandal. Long-term U.S. political alignments in the whole East-Asian region must not be jeopardized for the short-term objectives of the scandal investigation."

But that is our current situation.

In his speech to the Asia Society last June, Secretary Vance noted three goals in our Korean policy:

The renegotiation of the truce agreement;

Dual admission of the two Koreas into the United Nations; and Normalization of relations between the two Koreas.

Obviously, such steps take time, and little or no progress has been made on these goals. Thus, it is possible that a deferral of the withdrawal could be used as minimal leverage to return the two Koreas to a negotiating table. I frankly doubt that anything more could be expected in the present environment.

Deferral of the withdrawal would also allow time to pursue this issue with the Chinese. Clearly, the PRC may be the key to unlocking a truculent North Korea. Thus, any improvements in Sino-American bilateral relations may enable us to obtain greater Chinese assistance with the Korean problem.

In closing, let me reaffirm my support for the basic policy. It is a justifiable position over time, given our desire to minimize the prospects of involvement in another Asian war on the ground, given the potential power of the South with its economic and population advantages over the North, and the need to enable the ROK to militarily and psychologically stand by itself.

But I feel withdrawal must be tied to the actual, in-place ability of the South Koreans to take over, and not to a timetable set prior to what has developed into a different and unforeseen situation.

For the reasons indicated above, my major concern is that 1978 is not the year to begin the drawdown.

Best personal regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN GLENN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my letter to the President be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Chairman, Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, in a letter of July 20 of this year from the President to Senator ROBERT BYRD, the President expressed his concern about our phasing our withdrawal of U.S. ground combat forces from South Korea, and he expressed his concern about Congress placing restraints on his ability to redeploy the force. He stated:

Apparently that concern results largely from the incorrect impression that withdrawal will follow a rigid timetable not subject to modification in the light of changing circumstances. This has never been the case.

I skip a couple of sentences in the President's letter.

He indicated that it is natural and appropriate that South Korea assume a greater share of the burden of its own defense. He stated:

However, that burden must be assumed prudenty and carefully. For this reason, I decided last April to defer a significant portion of the first phase of U.S. troop withdrawals until next year in order to give the Congress sufficient time to deal with the important question of equipment transfer authority.

It is my view that withdrawal phased over a four- to five-year period will be sufficiently flexible to accommodate developments on the peninsula.

He expects our program to be carried out in a manner which will maintain a military balance.

I read another paragraph in its entirety because I think it is important to our discussion here today:

Reports issued by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee propose that the Administration undertake full reviews of the impact of our plans, the force balance, and the international environment in connection with further ground force withdrawals from Korea, and report to the Congress on the results of these reviews. I endorse the Committees' aim and look forward to sharing our assessments with the Congress.

That is a direct quotation from the letter of the President.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have the President's letter printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, D.C., July 20, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT BYRD,
Majority Leader, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

To Senator Robert Byrd:

I understand that concern about the program for careful and phased withdrawal of U.S. ground combat forces from South Korea has prompted some in the Congress to propose placing restraints on my ability to redeploy these forces. Apparently that concern results largely from the incorrect impression that withdrawal will follow a rigid timetable not subject to modification in the light of changing circumstances. This has never been the case.

The withdrawal policy should be seen in the context of the international environment in Northeast Asia and the rapidly growing economic strength of the Republic of Korea. It is natural and appropriate that South Korea assume a greater share of the burden of its own defense. However, that burden must be assumed prudently and carefully. For this reason, I decided last April to defer a significant portion of the first phase of U.S. troop withdrawals until next year in order to give the Congress sufficient time to deal with the important question of equipment transfer authority.

It is my view that withdrawal phased over a four- to five-year period will be sufficiently flexible to accommodate developments on the peninsula. I expect the withdrawal program to be carried out in a manner which preserves a military balance and thus protects the security of the Republic of Korea. Should circumstances affecting the balance change significantly, we will assess these changes in close consultation with the Congress, the Republic of Korea and our other Asian allies. Our plans will be adjusted if developments so warrant.

Reports issued by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House International Relations Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee propose that the Administration undertake full reviews of the impact of our plans, the force balance, and the international environment in connection with further ground force withdrawals from Korea, and I report to the Congress on the results of these reviews. I endorse the Committees' aim and look forward to sharing our assessments with the Congress.

Meanwhile, it is most important that I have the necessary authority to begin equipment transfers and training operations which will safeguard the military balance on the peninsula. I hope the Congress will promptly enact the equipment transfer authority and foreign military sales credit authorizations already recommended by both the Senate Foreign Relations and House International Relations Committees.

Sincerely,

JIMMY CARTER.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I am very happy to see the President indicating that he will cooperate in making these assessments, that he is not committed to a rigid timetable, and that he will share his views, after this assessment, with the appropriate congressional committees; namely, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the House International Relations Committee, and the Senate Armed Services Committee.

I think the President has indicated that he is going along exactly the route of the requirement that will be laid down if the amendment by the Senator from Illinois, as amended by the Senator from Georgia, is agreed to in a few moments.

Mr. President, Northeast Asia is the most volatile region in the world, a place where the interests of all four major powers intersect. This situation makes even more dangerous the fragile balance now existing between the two Koreas. This interaction between North and South Korea occurs along two fronts: First, a military confrontation; second, a political confrontation. I want to briefly discuss both aspects.

We all share a deep concern that our withdrawal program not endanger peace in Northeast Asia. As Members on both sides of the aisle know, I have been critical of the administration in the past on this matter. The issue posed by the amendments now before us is not how best to implement a withdrawal of U.S. troops from Korea or the timetable for such a program. The President in his letter to Senator BYRD has reassured us on both accounts:

The withdrawal will be implemented only after consultation with the Congress;

The timetable is flexible;

And can be adjusted in the light of external events or changing circumstances.

President Carter clearly states his intention to preserve a military balance on the Korean peninsula an thus protect the security of the Republic of Korea. This was a judicious and welcome decision by the President.

THE MILITARY BALANCE AND DETERRENCE

At issue here is what constitutes deterrence. There is no quantitative answer. Because of the North Korean firepower advantage and the proximity of Seoul to the DMZ, the rough equivalence, mentioned by President Park in his 1978 New Year's press conference, requires the strengthening of ROK forces to achieve a successful forward defense of Seoul without the presence of the 2d Infantry Division. Over time these additional military capabilities will exist in South Korea. It has always been my position that the timing of phased withdrawals must coincide with the ability of South Korean forces to assume the defensive role of departing American troops. To do otherwise is to endanger a precarious peace and risk military adventuring by the North. President Carter's letter makes clear his personal commitment to a prudent and balanced withdrawal process.

One cannot be sure what motivates Kim Il-Sung, and I do not think deterrence has yet been lessened sufficiently to tempt him to aggression. Unlike 1950, there is no pitifully weak South Korea or an American policy stating that South Korea is outside the American defense perimeter. Indeed, the reverse is the case. South Korea is strong, with the potential for eventually being far stronger than North Korea, and the United States is on record through words and deeds as committed to the defense of South Korea. I doubt that Kim Il-Sung misunderstands this commitment; his propaganda machine certainly makes clear that we remain committed to upholding our Mutual Defense Treaty. Given the firm U.S. commitment to the defense of the Republic of Korea (ROK), any North-South comparison of a military balance is somewhat artificial. Although it is true that, when U.S. forces are excluded, North Korea is superior in firepower and mobility, the combined U.S.-ROK forces on the peninsula have rough equivalence with the North. More significantly, when U.S. reinforcement capabilities in the Western Pacific are added to the balance, the scale tips decisively in favor of the U.S.-ROK alinement.

Mr. President, this whole concept of withdrawing troops from Korea while providing additional equipment to South Korean forces is complex, but can be viewed as evolving around two central questions. Will the defensive position of South Korea be weakened? And, does North Korea view these changes as advantageous to its position?

These two questions can largely be answered by reciting the same facts—counting uniformed soldiers on each side of the 38th parallel, comparing the numbers and the quality of their weapons and equipment, and generally making a military assessment of the two sides. But numerical comparisons alone ignore significant military aspects. Intangibles such as combat experience, quality of leadership, and morale, are all important and imprecise variables which can decide battles. To the extent one can judge these subjective variables, I believe South Korea has the superior military forces. The key to continued peace in Korea lies with the intent of Communist leadership. The South will not first attack the North, and I believe the North will not dare attack the South if it believes the United States remains committed to the defense of the Republic of Korea.

One signal we can send to Pyongyang that we are so committed would be to pass the legislation before us and provide authorization for transferring equipment to South Korean forces as we begin to withdraw our own ground forces. This will demonstrate that we are fully prepared to continue to support South Korea in its determination to bear its full responsibilities for its defense as it builds its economy toward the goal of joining major developed countries of the world. For South Korea that goal is within reach, but only if its economy and society are allowed to develop in peace.

With respect to military balance, the numbers of ground forces in the two Koreas are roughly comparable. Although the South holds a slight numerical advantage and possesses recent combat experience, the North holds a substantial margin in firepower and mobility over the South. It is clear that the North achieved this numerical superiority in weapons by disregarding the welfare of its own people and conducting a long-term buildup of military forces at the expense of other segments of its economy and society. At the same time, the leadership of South Korea chose to emphasize overall economic development, with dramatic results on that front.

Our combat troop withdrawal from Korea must be conducted in a way that will insure that stability is maintained on the peninsula. If we pass the legislation currently consideration, as U.S. ground troops leave, we will turn over $800 million in military equipment to bolster South Korean forces, in addition to continuing assistance to Korea's military modernization program. Further, the residual U.S. air and naval forces make clear the automatic involvement of U.S. forces in the event of overt aggression. It is therefore unlikely that the withdrawal of ground combat troops substantially lessens deterrence. Is Kim Il-Sung anxious to commit national suicide? I doubt it. Exercise Team Spirit, these statements of Secretary Brown, Ambassador Mansfield, and the Commander on the spot, General Vessey, make clear our continuing commitment to the defense of South Korea. Given that commitment, our residual forces and our reinforcement capabilities, it is difficult to argue that North Korea is not genuinely impressed by the combined military power of the United States and South Korea. A continuing U.S. military presence makes unlikely an unpromising North Korean invasion. Moreover, I doubt that Pyongyang has forgotten the devastation of North Korea during the Korean war. As a pilot in that conflict, I can assure you the North Korea capital was rubble. They guessed wrong in 1950 and paid a heavy price including the creation of a confirmed anti-communist majority in South Korea. They are unlikely to repeat that error so long as we are determined.

I am frankly less optimistic than our President that South Korea will be able to replace all our ground forces without some loss of combat capabilities in only 5 years. Thus, until now I have been skeptical of the program, but with the removal of arbitrary timetables. I am not skeptical. I do not question that there will come a time—and I do not think that time is far off—when South Korean forces, with the equipment we have provided, will be able successfully to defeat any North Korean attack with support from U.S. air and sea power. Moreover, to insure that our compensatory program is adequate, I have asked the Comptroller General to investigate these efforts and report back to Congress.

POLITICAL REALITY

Mr. President, my second point of discussion is the political reality, specifically the views of our Asian allies regarding U.S. troop withdrawals. The amendment presented by my friend from Illinois states flatly that our withdrawal program is dangerous. The second, I will propose for myself and Senators NUNN, GOLDWATER, and MATSUNAGA, calls for our withdrawal program to be implemented in a sensible and prudent manner.

What impact will our program have on our friends and allies in Asia? At this time, I would like to address this second significant question.

Mr. President, we are in a critical period when our allies in Asia look to us for actions to give credibility to our words. We must demonstrate to them that the United States is serious about its commitment to the defense of South Korea. In particular, we must assure them we will provide military assistance to the Koreans as our troops are withdrawn.

Japanese leaders have frequently said that they see the security of the Republic of Korea as essential to their own security. There was some initial apprehension in Japan when we announced our troop withdrawal plan. I believe, however, that in the 18 months since the withdrawal was announced, the Japanese Government has been reassured both by the gradual and responsible manner in which the withdrawal is being carried out, and by our firm intention to accompany the withdrawal with military assistance to the Korean forces not in place yet. The Japanese understand, as do others in Asia, that the phased troop withdrawal is not a sign of changing U.S. resolve. This assessment is buttressed by the absence of any noticeable Japanese rearmament program. Thus, the Japanese have been reassured and will share, I believe, my welcome of the President's unequivocal intent to relate the withdrawal to developments on the Korean peninsula.

Although we often view United States–Korean relationships as a bilateral security matter, our role in Korea is meaningful to friends and allies all over East Asia. Here, as nowhere else, we face both a challenge and an opportunity. The challenge is to assure peace and stability and the continued prosperity of a major ally with whom we have a mutual defense treaty. The opportunity is that afforded by South Korea's own emergence as a major force in Asia, a viable and confident nation willing and able to shoulder more of the burden of its own defense with our support.

Mr. President, the administration belatedly recognized the need to give visible proof of our intention to maintain a role in Asia and to honor our commitments. Last spring Vice President MONDALE discussed with foreign leaders in Tokyo, Manila, Canberra, and elsewhere our firm intention to support Korean stability and security. Japan's Prime Minister Fukuda exchanged views with the President during his visit to Washington of this year. Secretary of State Vance and Secretary of Defense Brown consulted with Japanese leaders last summer and have made it clear, in several major addresses, that we are not abandoning and cannot abandon, our traditional role in assuring a strong and prosperous Republic of Korea. Mr. Brzezinski has visited Tokyo and Seoul, and among other subjects discussed our Korean policy with leaders of those countries.

In short, we are not quitting. We are not bugging out. Our plan, Mr. President, is to gradually and prudently withdraw American ground forces while providing the assistance necessary to bolster the defensive capabilities of the South Korean forces. And as has been stated, U.S. air and naval forces will still be deployed in Korea. Today's Republic of Korea is a strong and confident nation, but its strength depends on our continued support. Fully honoring that commitment is the only way to deter aggression from the North and it is also the best assurance we can give our other allies of the credibility and continuity of the words of our Government, our Nation, and our people.

There is, however, one point regarding potential adversaries which I think should be raised at this time. I point particularly to the existence of some hostility between the Soviet Union and the People's Republic of China.

There is no evidence that either the People's Republic of China or the Soviet Union has any interest in disturbing the stability of the Korean peninsula. Both regard a renewed North Korean aggression as a highly undesirable and complicating factor in the tense and explosive relationship between the two great powers themselves. In this light and for their own interests, each would want to restrain any inclination the North Koreans may have toward military adventure against South Korea.

There is no evidence that either the People's Republic of China or the Soviet Union has any confidence that North Korea would win a quick or even easy victory over South Korea. Both know U.S. forces would quickly become involved in the conflict, thereby raising the prospects of wider hostilities.

The Soviets and Chinese know, Mr. President, that we are not abandoning Korea. They should know that we have the resolve to provide military assistance in the interests of security, that our phased withdrawal of ground troops will be carried out responsibly, and that our air and naval presence in the area will remain. We continue to have a strong interest in South Korean security, and we should leave no doubt in the minds of Moscow, Peking, or Pyongyang that we possess the will to support that commitment.

Our best hope for peace is a limited reconciliation between the two Koreas. Prudently phased withdrawals and the President's policy insure a continuing U.S. security commitment to South Korea while offering an opportunity to break the diplomatic impasse of the past 25 years. Only if Kim Il-Sung is convinced of U.S. determination and of the South Korean resolve as an independently capable state—not a U.S. "puppet" as he charges—will Kim negotiate. The President's policy when carried out as stated, will provide deterrence, help to create South Korean legitimacy, and will preserve peace and stability.

Mr. President, I am prepared to yield back the remainder of our time, unless others have statements to make.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I have one question, if the Senator will yield.

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. NUNN. I pose this question to the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Ohio.

The President has announced certain withdrawal of troops, mostly support troops, a few combat troops, during calendar year 1978. He has presented, through his witnesses from the State Department and the Department of Defense, testimony to both the Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Armed Services Committee on that proposal.

My question to the Senator from Illinois is whether the amendment he has proposed will basically require the prior consultation and no further withdrawal—whether that begins in calendar year 1978 or whether it will be his intent to begin that after calendar year 1978, and exempt those troops that the President already has indicated he would be withdrawing this year.

Mr. PERCY. I thank my distinguished colleague for asking that question which the Senator from Illinois has already discussed with the Senator from Georgia, the Senator from Ohio, and the Senator from New York.

There is no intention by the sponsors of this amendment to interfere with the program of the President and the administration for fiscal year 1978.

But it is our intention that there shall be full advance consultation with Congress for any troop withdrawals planned by the administration for fiscal year 1979.

Mr. NUNN. When the Senator ties it to the fiscal year now that does not really begin until October 1, 1978, and some of these troops are already being talked about and already being fully represented to Congress will be withdrawn from October 1, 1978, to January 1, 1979, so my question is whether those troops are contemplated by this amendment or whether they would really be exempt from this amendment.

Mr. PERCY. The Senator from Illinois asks this question of our distinguished colleague. As a member of the Armed Services Committee, what are the figures for troop withdrawal in calendar year 1978? How many are we talking about?

Mr. NUNN. Overall, it is my understanding, 2,600 support troops and approximately 800 combat troops. I am not certain as to the precise number of those who have already been removed from Korea. I do not know whether any member of the staff here is aware of exactly the number that have been withdrawn now. But it would be the understanding of the Senator from Georgia that during calendar year 1978 it is contemplated there will be about 3,400 troops withdrawn from Korea, about 2,600 will be support troops and about 800 will be combat troops.

My point is that I believe that part of this contingency of troops will probably be withdrawn between October 1 and January 1 of calendar year 1978.

Mr. PERCY. The judgment of the Senator from Illinois is that that will not materially affect the security of the United States, and the security of South Korea and will not have any adverse effect on our allies in the Pacific.

The position taken by the Senator from Illinois is really no different from the position taken over a period of many, many years, ever since he has been a Member of the Senate with respect to troop withdrawals in Europe. There have been modest troop withdrawals there on occasion and shifts which had no effect on the balance of power. The Senator from Illinois vigorously opposed the Mansfield amendment to withdraw U.S. troops from Europe, and regretfully so because of his affection and love for our distinguished majority leader through the years. I believe that effective diplomacy is possible only from a position of strength and that many times wars are created through unnecessary risks that are taken and false signals that are sent out. But the small number of troops to be withdrawn this calendar year would be acceptable to the Senator from Illinois.

From that point forward, however, this sense of the Congress resolution would require full advance consultation with Congress for any further troop withdrawals.

Mr. NUNN. I thank the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, that is my understanding also of what we intended with this. It was certainly my intent that we not try and undo anything that is already being accomplished now but that the withdrawals that the Senator from Georgia refers to, that were to be accomplished by the end of this year, would not be interfered with by the amendment that we are passing here today.

Mr. NUNN. That also is my understanding. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter I have sent to the Comptroller General be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., July 24, 1970.

Hon. ELMER B. STAATS,
Comptroller General of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. STAATS: I am writing to request that the General Accounting Office conduct an investigation of the adequacy of U.S. compensatory measures now underway in conjunction with the withdrawal of ground combat forces from the Republic of Korea (ROK). In particular, the analysis should examine the logistical support capabilities of the ROK, the training program being conducted for ROK personnel, the sufficiency of emergency facilities should the United States redeploy ground combat forces in the future, and the effectiveness of the Defense Audit Service in monitoring the withdrawal and associated U.S. compensatory measures.

Obviously, the nature and adequacy of U.S. assistance to the ROK armed forces is critical in preserving a military balance and in hopefully insuring deterrence. Your assistance in this undertaking is appreciated.

Best regards.

Sincerely,

JOHN GLENN,
Chairman, Subcommittee on East Asian and Pacific Affairs.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, this letter requests:

that the General Accounting Office conduct an investigation of the adequacy of U.S. compensatory measures now underway in conjunction with the withdrawal of ground combat forces from the Republic of Korea (ROK). In particular, the analysis should examine the logistical support capabilities of the ROK, the training program being conducted for ROK personnel, the sufficiency of emergency facilities should the United States redeploy ground combat forces in the future, and the effectiveness of the Defense Audit Service in monitoring the withdrawal and associated U.S. compensatory measures.

The letter further states:

Obviously, the nature and adequacy of U.S. assistance to the ROK armed forces is critical in preserving a military balance and in hopefully insuring deterrence.

The GAO, Mr. President, has indicated that they would be capable of taking that on, and they are happy to assume the task.

I think this once again can give us an independent assessment of what is truly adequate without relying just on our own defense people over in the Pentagon.

Mr. NUNN. I certainly agree with the Senator from Ohio, and I congratulate him on this initiative.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. PERCY. The Senator from Illinois is happy to yield 2 or 3 minutes to the Senator from New York.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with my colleagues in having worked out this problem in terms of language, purpose, and timing. My contribution to this debate, which I wish to make, is attributable to the fact that I visited the Republic of Korea last December and I can affirm to my colleagues the validity of the concern that there could be a very grave erosion of morale not only among the people of the Republic of Korea, who are being so successful economically, but also among their armed forces. Hence it is critically important that Congress be intimately associated in any action taken which might be considered premature to reduce our Armed Forces, and that is our Armed Forces upon which they depend very heavily, and also to coordinate that not only with consultation with Congress but with the equipment and readiness of the Korean forces.

Finally, let us remember that there is a critically important triangle in the Pacific in terms of security. It consists of Taiwan, the Republic of Korea, and Japan, and that is a very big one.

It is my convinced judgment when I visited all three countries last December with Mr. Lakeland, my foreign policy assistant, that they lean on each other very heavily and that if one of those parts comes unstuck through lack of confidence, erosion of morale, or subjugation, and certainly that is the most awesome possibility, there is grave danger that they could come unstuck.

Hence I consider this sense of Congress resolution one of the most critical that we are adopting in this particular bill.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, may I have 2 minutes yielded to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I certainly commend the distinguished Senators from Illinois, Ohio, Georgia, and New York for working out a compromise. I think many of us have been concerned about this and certainly those who have just spoken have spent a great deal of time on it. They understand it fully.

Last year when the President and we were asked to endorse the President's program I submitted an amendment which was eventually watered down, but I think it did indicate there would be a consultation by the President of any decision with respect to reduction of troops in Korea.

I am not aware of any consultation, but I understand now there has been and will continue to be, and I think that is a step in the right direction.

So I support the amendment as modified and as worked out by my distinguished colleagues.

SOUTH KOREAN TROOP WITHDRAWAL

Mr. President, I support this amendment proposed by my colleague, Mr. PERCY. This is an issue which has occupied my concern and attention for quite some time. I feel that Mr. PERCY's amendment, as modified, is a valuable opportunity to actively express the concern of the entire Senate on this matter.

GROWING OPPOSITION TO WITHDRAWAL

The troop withdrawal program proposed by the President last year has come under increasing critcism. Intelligence reports reveal that the current military balance between North and South Korea is not nearly secure enough to allow the withdrawal of the majority of the American troops as the President has proposed to do by 1982. Despite the growing economic superiority of the Republic of Korea, they have not maintained the wartime footing that the North Koreans have, which has enabled them to gain a numerical advantage. That the North Korean dictator, Kim Il Sung, is quit willing, indeed, anxious to use this advantage cannot be seriously questioned.

U.S. INTERESTS STILL IMPORTANT

The United States has maintained significant interests and commitments in South Korea over the years. It is important to remember that the United States is in Korea because of its importance to our national security and strategic interests, as well as to the security of the Pacific. These interests are being threatened now by a program which fails to give proper consideration to potential adverse consequences.

CONCERN OVER THE PROGRAM NOTHING NEW

Concern over this program is not something new. It has been questioned and disputed almost from the moment it was proposed, and more recent developments—troop reductions in Taiwan, base reductions in the Philippines—have heightened valid concerns about U.S. commitments to the security of the western Pacific region. Last year I submitted an amendment which opposed Senate endorsement of the President's program, which was countered by the majority leader. We were assured that Congress would be consulted by the President, and any decision with respect to the reduction of troops from Korea would be arrived at "by joint decision of the President and Congress." So far, I am not aware of any input of Congress on this important issue, much less any mandate to proceed with the withdrawal. Until such a provision for joint consultation is insured by the Executive, and until all potential consequences have been thoroughly studied, further implementation of the program should be halted. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Illinois warrants serious consideration and the support of the Senate.

DOLE COLLOQUY

Two weeks ago, during Senate consideration of the Defense Department authorization bill, I engaged in a related colloquy with Senator NUNN, chairman of the Subcommittee on Manpower and Personnel. At that time, we discussed the possible risk to the current military balance in the area of withdrawing American ground forces, particularly if this appears to encourage aggression from North Korea. The Senator from Kansas specifically inquired as to whether the "power vacuum" which would result might be too much of a temptation to the North Koreans. We discussed the present progress of the withdrawal program and the anticipated withdrawals for the coming year and we emphasized the importance of a directive from the Armed Services Committee to the Defense Department, to provide a thorough analysis of the impact of the troop withdrawal.

I think that the Senator from Georgia's responses to those questions were revealing and significant. We agreed that removal of the troops clearly involves risks and concerns, and that the detailed analysis requested of the Defense Department was a minimum precondition to further reductions in Korea. The administration's plans to remove 3,400 troops by December 1978 has been deferred. Now only 800 troops in 1 combat division will be removed during this calendar year. The remaining 2,600 in this group would be removed during 1979, but only after the analysis directed by the committee has been submitted. I think it is fair to say, as well, that the Senate may wish to advise against further troop reductions after that report is submitted.

In the meantime, the amendment offered today seems wise, from this Senator's viewpoint. I feel it would send a proper message to the administration, to our allies in the Pacific region, and to potential aggressors.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of my colloquy with Senator NUNN on July 10 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PARTIAL EXCERPT FROM THE DOLE-NUNN COLLOQUY ON U.S. TROOP WITHDRAWAL FROM SOUTH KOREA

Mr. DOLE. First, the committee report states clearly that committee members are "concerned about possible risks to the current military balance of any further withdrawal of American ground forces, particularly if it appeared to encourage aggression by North Korea." That is certainly a concern which the Senator from Kansas shares, and which I think troubles a good number of Americans. Would the chairman of the subcommittee agree that the complete withdrawal of all American ground forces from South Korea within the next 5 years creates a "power vacuum" in the area that might well tempt aggression from the north?

Mr. NUNN. That certainly is a concern of the Senator from Georgia.

Different people might well define a "power vacuum" in different ways. It is clear that there are serious risks and concerns involved in a troop withdrawal.

One of the principal reasons for the proposed withdrawal is to eliminate the prospect of automatic U.S. involvement in a future Korean conflict. But even after the proposed withdrawal, some 14,000 U.S. troops would remain—virtually guaranteeing immediate and substantial U.S. casualties in the event of another conflict on the Korean peninsula.

It is also true that South Korea faces a substantial military threat by a country hostile to the United States and with a history of military adventurism.

To assure that any withdrawal does not encourage aggression and is considered in the light of other U.S. policies, it is important that the relevant issues be addressed. That is why the committee, in its report, directs the Secretary of Defense to provide an analysis to the committee before any future withdrawal of ground combat troops. That analysis should consider at least:

The effect of any proposed withdrawal on preserving deterrence in Korea;

The reaction anticipated from North Korea;

A consideration of the effect of the plan on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent;

The effect on our long-term military and economic partnership with Japan;

The effect on U.S.-China and U.S.-Soviet military balance; and

The possible implications on the Soviet-Chinese military situation.

The committee is not trying to prevent any withdrawal at any time in the future but is trying to raise the issues that need to be analyzed before any additional withdrawals are made.

Mr. DOLE. The second question:

How many U.S. ground forces have already been withdrawn from Korea under the President's "phased withdrawal" program? What is the present force level? What is the anticipated force withdrawal during calendar year 1979?

Mr. NUNN. The latest information the committee has indicates that on December 31, 1977, there were about 40,000 U.S. military personnel in Korea, including 32,000 Army troops.

The original plan proposed the withdrawal of 6,000 ground troops by December 1978 and the withdrawal of the remaining ground combat units over the next 4 or 5 years. Of that 6,000 about 2,600 are in combat service support activities and have already been withdrawn or are scheduled to be withdrawn this summer or fall. The principal concern was over 3,400 troops scheduled for withdrawal in December 1978, including a brigade of ground combat Army troops of the 2d Division.

In April of this year, the President announced his decision to defer the scheduled withdrawal of U.S. combat troops in Korea except for one battalion. That means 800 troops in one combat battalion will be withdrawn by December 1978. DOD current plans would have the withdrawal of the 2,600 troops in the two combat battalions, the brigade headquarters and miscellaneous other units withdrawn during 1979. However, the analysis directed by the committee would be submitted before any future withdrawal, including any in 1979.

The administration has not announced a change to the overall plan of withdrawing the remaining ground combat troops over the next 4–5 years.

Mr. DOLE. Question 3:

In its report on the military procurement authorization bill, the committee directs the Secretary of Defense to provide an analysis of likely strategic and political consequences of the force reductions, before any further withdrawal of ground combat troops is undertaken.

I certainly agree with that approach, as I think the entire program needs to be more carefully evaluated for all its potential implications. Is the chairman confident that the executive branch will comply with that directive from the committee without a more specific legislative mandate such as an amendment to this bill?

Mr. NUNN. I say to my colleague from Kansas that I am confident that the Department of Defense will comply with the committee directive. I do not know what they will come back with in terms of the words of the report.

I am not certain that our committee or the subcommittee or the Senator from Kansas or the Senator from Georgia, will be entirely satisfied with the report, but I am confident that they will at least comply with the directive and give us an answer.

As part of its recommendations on active duty military personnel strength, our committee must review overseas troop deployment plans, and the committee is indicating that this analysis is essential if any of these plans include a withdrawal of ground combat troops from Korea.

Mr. DOLE. I think it should be clear on the record that the Senate as a whole expects the executive branch to comply with the directives, insisting upon a thorough analysis before additional troops are withdrawn.

The Senator from Kansas would be prepared to offer a specific amendment to this effect; and I believe—although I am not certain—we would have the votes to approve it. Based on the assurance of my colleague, who is chairman of the subcommittee, I believe such an amendment will be unnecessary.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I wish to respond very briefly. I have been very, very critical of the administration in this area of what has happened in Korea. But I must say that in recent months there has been a decided improvement, and I wish to point that out. There has been a great deal more consultation and I think with the President's letter that I put into the RECORD a short time ago the commitment of the President to further consult and in committing himself to that to me is a real step forward.

I think that has been one of the major difficulties with the administration in the area of foreign policy, which is they have not consulted sufficiently. We are not a parliamentary system where the President speaks with final authority on foreign policy. We are a system of checks and balances, and we share that responsibility with the President of the United States. I think that has been overlooked, perhaps, in the past, and has caused some difficulties.

I think some of this prior consultation and getting people on board in a cooperative working out of problems in advance of some of our commitments is probably the most constructive thing the President of the United States and this administration can do.

So I am particularly happy that he has seen fit to write the letter to Senator BYRD that he has, committing himself to doing exactly that with regard to Korea, prior assessment of things and prior consultation with the Senate and with appropriate committees of the Senate and of the House.

When we look at Korea, it is a very critical situation. I do not think most people in this Nation, perhaps most people in the administration even, fully appreciate the critical nature of these military alinements in Korea.

The intent of the North Koreans cannot be misinterpreted. The military deployment of their forces is in an offensive position. They have tunnels dug under the front. I was down in one of those tunnels when I was there, as I imagine Senator Javits was, too, in his trip out there.

They have combat bridging ready to cross the rivers. The South Koreans have nothing of that type. The artillery is forward in an attack mode in North Korea, and some of that artillery is able to reach almost into the northern suburbs of South Korea from its present positioning.

So we certainly cannot overestimate the criticality of this situation. That is the reason why every movement we make out there must be very, very carefully considered. I certainly welcome the President's commitments to share that burden with us.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I just wish to point out that it is 25 miles from the front line to Seoul. That is critical of the whole situation.

Mr. GLENN. It certainly is.

We are alined with American forces in that approach channel, that Kaesong corridor, and we are in a tripwire position there, reserve position, true, and I will not go on describing the situation there this evening.

I am prepared to yield back our time and get on with the vote here this evening. But we are glad to see the President committing to prior consultation with us before any further moves. I think that is a real step forward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE). Is all time yielded back?

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, in the comments of the Senator from Illinois earlier this evening, he referred to the attitude of our allies, particularly Japan which is vital to U.S. policy in the Pacific.

The Senator from Illinois has alluded to conversations he has had with high officials in Japan over the years, as well as many intimate friends he has had over a quarter of a century. There is no better authority than my distinguished junior colleague from California, Senator HAYAKAWA, and I yield 5 minutes to Senator HAYAKAWA and I would specifically ask our distinguished colleague to tell us what his attitude is toward the security position of the United States and our Asian allies, and what it would be if we were to go forward with a proposal for the withdrawal of ground forces from South Korea.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the distinguished Senator from Illinois.

I would like to submit for the record a number of articles written in the past 2 years concerning Japanese defense policy. They suggest that President Carter's decisions to withdraw our ground forces from Korea have affected the debate in Japan about Japan's future defense policy.

It seems to me that recent events give added significance to these articles and also some perception to remarks made last year by my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Senator GLENN, who is chairman of the Subcommittee on East Asia of the Foreign Relations Committee.

Senator GLENN pointed out that it is difficult to tell the American people why the United States should have a major imbalance in our trade relationship with Japan with a current accounts surplus running into billions in Japan's favor while the Japanese rely almost completely on the American nuclear umbrella and our conventional forces in the Western Pacific for the defense of Japan. It is at least curious that the second largest nation in terms of GNP in the free world should spend less than 1 percent of its GNP on its own defense while the United States and the members of the NATO alliance spend between 4 and 5.5 percent. The "Defense White Paper" issued by the Japanese Government in 1977 describes this ceiling on defense spending as "a Cabinet decision for the interim future." Senator GLENN's statement to which I referred raises a point which to me is relevant today and likely to be relevant for many years. He said:

> It is difficult for many of our people to see why Japan cannot assume at least some (burden) greater than 1 percent of the GNP . . . Arbitrarily setting a 1-percent limit without regard to what that would buy is unrealistic. If there are certain legitimate defense needs, those needs have to be met.

We have heard a great deal this year about the needs of NATO and about the Soviet threat to NATO. And the Senate has welcomed the pledge from the NATO Defense Ministers to increase the real level of defense spending in their countries by 3 percent a year for the next 5 years in order to improve NATO's defense capabilities to meet the growing Soviet military buildup in Eastern Europe. Unfortunately, in my view, there has been too little attention given to the Asian dimension of our defense policy, particularly with respect to the regional role of Japan in Asia in the context of the administration's decision to withdraw ground forces from Korea.

I have previously associated myself with an important statement by my distinguished colleague from Oklahoma, Senator BARTLETT, on Japan's defense policy, and today I wish to call attention to the concerns that he has raised which have apparently been met only by silence from the administration. Senator BARTLETT'S impressive study of Japanese defense policy contained these comments:

> A. "Because of logistical shortages, Japanese forces could not fight for even a month to protect the country against a serious conventional attack."
> B. "Japan should conduct its air and naval activities—particularly in patrols and intelligence—with more efficiency and assertiveness. It should discourage Soviet penetrations and harrassment of its waters and air space, in particular, it needs a more effective antisubmarine capability in an area encompassing several hundred miles around the home islands."
> C. "Going a big step further, Japan must protect its vital energy sea lanes through the Indian Ocean to the Mideast, the source of 74% of its energy requirements and its food sea lanes."
> D. "A fourth point concerns a role for Japan in Korean security."
> D. "A Japanese decision, in conjunction with the U.S., to help underwrite the security of South Korea in the present circumstances can have only beneficial effects. This step could be contingent upon some U.S. forces remaining in Korea. The Japanese undertaking could begin with a diplomatic commitment, the development of trilateral air defense contingencies and intelligence endeavors, and some military assistance credits."

Mr. President, I believe Senator BARTLETT'S suggestions merit consideration, and I too am concerned about the need for Japan to play a larger role both in international security affairs and in its own defense. I understand that many Japanese have the impression that the U.S. Government, particularly the present administration, wishes to continue the so-called 1 percent ceiling on Japanese defense spending. I sincerely hope this is not the message that our Embassy in Japan is conveying to the Japanese leadership. In this regard, may I bring to the attention of the Senate several examples of the new attitudes in Tokyo toward Japan's future defense policy? I believe these are healthy trends at work in Japan which will lead to a more enlightened approach to Japan's defense which can only benefit our own country as well. I am sure that our Embassy and our distinguished Ambassador in Tokyo are following these changes in Japanese defense attitudes and would do nothing to interfere with the natural process of debate and decisionmaking in this sensitive area of internal politics.

Let me mention only a few examples. To illustrate new Japanese attitudes toward defense policy.

First, in sharp contrast to the acrimonious defense debates of a decade or more ago, this year's Japanese Diet discussion of the defense budget revealed many new ideas and plans which appeared almost daily in the newspapers, but generated surprisingly little or no adverse reaction. In earlier years, outbursts and protests would have been expected at the news that the Japanese Government:

Has considered a plan to construct small aircraft carriers, if necessary for naval defense;

Has been successfully testing new precision guided weapons;

Has been studying mobilization planning for the first time this decade;

Intends to retain the capabilities to refuel in midair and to engage in close air support bombing when it purchases the new American F–15 Eagle jet fighter in the 1980's;

Intends to send Japanese pilots to the United States for combat training;

Plans to establish the first "institute for strategic studies" that Japan has ever had to examine the security needs of Japan and debate these issues openly; and

Finally, the Japanese press has featured stories which defend the necessity of reaching agreements for defense cost-sharing with the United States in order to change Washington's opinions that the Japanese are receiving a "free ride" for defense.

In conclusion, Mr. President, let me state that I share the concern with Japan's future defense policy that has already been expressed by Senators GLENN and BARTLETT on earlier occasions, and I am looking forward to receiving soon the staff report from the Budget Committee, which, under the able leadership of our distinguished chairman from Maine and Senator HENRY BELLMON of Oklahoma, has looked into the relationship between our own defense budget and the future role that Japan may be playing in international security. I understand that the staff report is based on a recent trip to Japan and contains information gathered there which will be useful, in a number of ways, to the Committee on the Budget. It will also help us to understand the significance of the dismissal of General Kurisu, chairman of the Japanese military staff, yesterday. I would like to insert for the RECORD two articles from this morning's New York Times and the Washington Post about the unfortunate incident which seems to have implications for the shaping of new defenese attitudes in Tokyo.

It seems to me that the United States and Japan must leave behind the outdated rhetoric of the past and work together to find a more realistic division of responsibility for our mutual security. The days of American nuclear superiority are gone and the implications for Japan of this shift in the global balance of military power have got to be faced, squarely. The withdrawal of American ground forces from Korea, as proposed by the Carter administration, simply raises the larger issue of Japan's future role in Asia and in Korea.

I will be speaking about this subject again, and welcome the chance to discuss it with my colleagues, in the future.

I ask unanimous consent that a number of articles concerning Japanese defense policy be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JAPAN DEBATES SECURITY AS U.S. PULLS OUT OF KOREA

(By Scott Thompson)

TOKYO.—President Carter's decision to withdraw U.S. ground troops from South Korea has set off a profound national debate in Japan on two questions:

1. Will this country be forced into an accommodation with the Soviet Union (and a break in its security ties with the United States)?

2. Or, will it move rapidly now to increase its armaments to ensure its own defense under the cover of a continued U.S. nuclear umbrella?

The security concerns of the Japanese are real enough. From their northern islands, Soviet territory is plainly visible, as are submarines and surface ships whose purpose seems to be to remind the Japanese of the proximity of Soviet might.

But most worrisome is the buildup of Soviet strategic and tactical power in the region as a whole. The Soviet Pacific fleet long since has outstripped the tonnage and firepower of the U.S. 7th Fleet. The buildup of bases on the Kamchatka peninsula and on the nearby island of Sakhalin, along with the construction of new ice-breaking ships that will keep northern waters navigable yearround, concern Japanese defense planners deeply. So does new technology for coping with frozen soil.

The question of the four Kurile islands seized by the Soviets in the last few days of World War II only makes matters worse for the Japanese. The islands, in the "correct" view here, have never been anything but Japanese. Four years ago, the Soviets were saying that the issue of possession was negotiable, now they say it is not.

The Japanese resent the fact that President Franklin D. Roosevelt at the Yalta Conference in 1945 overlooked the advice of his own State Department to refuse the Soviets a green light to occupy the Kuriles. But today control of the entire Kurile chain is less a matter of territory for Moscow than it is of sea control: The islands give the Soviet Navy control over egress from the Sea of Okhotsk.

JAPAN MAY PAY MORE OF U.S. MILITARY EXPENSE

(By Bradley K. Martin)

TOKYO.—A reinterpretation of official policy appears to have cleared the way for Japan to contribute more to the rising costs of the United States military presence here.

The reinterpretation came in the Diet last week, as officials prepared for a coming visit to Washington by the chief of Japan's defense agency. It was not clear immediately what additional amounts, if any, Japan would pay.

While U.S. officials for several years have urged the Japanese to take over a larger share of the costs of the defense "umbrella" that the United States provides, the recent drastic devaluation of the dollar in terms of the yen has made the matter appear more pressing to officials of both countries.

A U.S. dollar is worth roughly 20 per cent less in yen than it was a year ago, and the cost of maintaining U.S. forces here has risen correspondingly to an estimated $1 billion. A newspaper here, the Yomiuri Daily News;, reported Wednesday that U.S. forces had reduced their training maneuvers as a response, but a U.S. military spokesman said he could not immediately confirm or deny this.

The Japanese contribution is substantial already. The amount this fiscal year is estimated at $619 million. The Japanese note that their share is nearly as large as the amount West Germany contributes to the U.S. defense effort there, about $730 million.

There are only 46,000 U.S. troops here, while there are about 220,000 in Germany. But the Germans spend more than 3 per cent of their gross national product on their own defense, U.S. officials note, while the Japanese, with a constitution officially outlawing armies and war, limit their defense spending to 1 per cent of the GNP.

A large portion of the money Japan spends on behalf of the U.S. forces is in rental payments for privately owned land included in U.S. bases. Japan also pays for the bases to meet Japanese standards, and last year it agreed to a $25 million program of labor cost-sharing.

A program involving hundreds of millions of dollars in Japanese contributions has been the consolidation of facilities formerly scattered at several small bases around Tokyo into one facility, Yokota Air Force Base. Japan has paid the replacement and relocation costs.

Operation and maintenance expenses for U.S. bases are borne by the United States, as is required by the "status of forces agreement," a document similar to a treaty that governs the military relationship.

One area where the United States could use some help is in housing its military personnel, many of whom now live off base. Housing allowances for U.S. servicemen and their families, reflecting the reduced value of the dollar, have had to be increased in many cases.

Japanese who believed it was important to bear more of the burden had been stymied by a stated official policy that seemed to limit the ways in which this could be done.

In 1973, Masayoshi Ohira, who was foreign minister, stated in the Diet what became known as the Ohira principle. It was that Japan would not provide the U.S. forces facilities and land exceeding the size of those being returned to Japanese control and hence being replaced.

The Ohira principle was seen until this week as implying that Japan would not provide any facilities and land except as replacements for those the United States might relinquish.

The forces seeking to increase the Japanese share, led by Shin Kanemaru, directer-general of the defense agency, were faced with the need to find a way around this implication without making a frontal assault on the Ohira principle as a whole.

The solution finally devised was to interpret the implication right out of the principle. This was done on Tuesday, when Akira Watari, director of the Defense Facilitation Administration agency, was being questioned by Dietmen.

Mr. Watari said the 1973 Ohira statement "did not include new facilities or additional items."

In other words, the principle applies only in cases where facilities are being relinquished by the United States and replaced by the Japanese. If a housing complex with 500 units is being replaced, it can have no more than 500 units.

Mr. Watari's interpretation appears to mean that Japan has no official policy that would prevent it from providing new housing units or other facilities or tracts of land of any size and number if they were not intended as replacements of existing facilities.

JAPAN SHOULD SPEND MORE ON ARMS, SEN. GLENN SAYS

(By Sam Jameson)

TOKYO.—Sen. John Glenn (D-Ohio), chairman of the Senate foreign relations subcommittee on East Asia, Wednesday called Japan's decision to limit its defense spending to 1 percent of its gross national product "unrealistic."

The former astronaut linked the issue of a growing American trade deficit with Japan with what he called the paucity of Japan's defense spending. He said the U.S. deficit with Japan could reach $5 billion to $7 billion this year and added:

"It's difficult to go home and tell our people that (even though) we are being outcompeted in some areas by Japanese industry and some of our own people are being put out of jobs, that we're willing to spend a lot more money for a nuclear umbrella and for (American) military forces here into the indefinite future.

"That lays it out very bluntly," Glenn said in a speech.

He said that American allies in the North Atlantic Treaty Organization were spending between 4 percent and 5.5 percent of their gross national products on defense to "carry their share of the burden."

"It's difficult for many of our people to see why Japan cannot assume at least some (burden) greater than 1 percent of the GNP," he added.

"Arbitrarily setting a 1-percent limit without regard to what (weapons and equipment) that would buy is unrealistic. If there are certain legitimate defense needs, those needs have to be met. You can't just set an arbitrary budget level and say, 'Well, we'll just have a few little guns here."

The Ohio Senator, who spent three days in South Korea, will participate in a four-day conference of American and Japanese politicians, businessmen, scholars and government officials, beginning today, before he returns home.

JAPANESE REARMAMENT DEBATE REVIVED

(By Frederic A. Moritz)

TOKYO.—Is Japan going to rearm when U.S. troops leave South Korea?

Observers here in Tokyo, both Japanese and Western, who are busy pondering with this question tend not to come up with quick, one-word answers. But they do concede that, with security-conscious Japan only 30 miles from the shores of South Korea at the closest point, the withdrawal policy is a powerful argument for those who favor rapid rearmament.

According to this line of reasoning, concern here over the security of the Korean peninsula may be a politically more compelling reason for building a strong new Japanese defense than the old arguments for countering the Chinese and the Soviet Union.

But the pace with which Japan rearms, it is expected, will continue to be limited by the longstanding and still widespread anti-militarism here, along with economic and strategic considerations.

BASIC BUDGET AT STAKE

For Japan to counter the massive Chinese and Soviet forces, for example, would require a vast increase in defense spending beyond the present level—not less than 1 percent of the gross national product. Thus, it has been opposed by business groups and consumers who want the resources used in other ways.

Such a buildup also would require a change in the anti-military provisions of the Constitution and a major increase in ground troop strength—politically the most unpopular kind of defense buildup.

But with a changed military situation in Korea, advocates of rearmament will have a respectable argument for a more limited build-up that is not anti-Chinese or anti-Soviet in nature, according to analysts here.

Such a buildup probably could be sold politically to the general public because it would not require a major increase in the size of the Army, the branch of service most closely identified with the World War II militarist regime.

SLOW BUILDUP MORE LIKELY

Instead, supporters of rearmament are expected to call initially for a gradual Air Force and naval buildup to prepare for the contingency that Korea might be reunified under Communist rule. It is thought that they want improved radar, defenses, surveillance aircraft, fighter and missile defense capacity, and perhaps an increased number of flighter-bombers.

All of this is not expected to happen overnight. For one thing, the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, the only major grouping relatively open to rearmament, is showing itself to be increasingly weak at the polls and may soon be forced into a coalition government with other parties.

But it is thought in some quarters that as U.S. troop withdrawals proceed over the next few years, other Japanese parties, especially those to the left of the political spectrum, increasingly will accept the idea of at least limited rearmament—just as they gradually have moved toward acceptance of the U.S.-Japanese mutual security treaty.

Even without the catalyst of a new U.S. policy on Korea, the Japanese self-defense forces gradually have grown. Today there are some 266,000 men and women in ground, air, and naval units. The defense budget for 1977 totals $9.15 billion, 11.8 percent higher than for the previous year.

Japan also makes more than 90 percent of its own arms.

JAPAN REMOVES RANKING OFFICER IN DEFENSE ROW

(By William Chapman)

TOKYO.—Japan's highest-ranking uniformed military officer was abruptly dismissed yesterday for making controversial remarks about civilian control of the country's defense forces.

Gen. Hiroomi Kurisu, chairman of the Joint Staff Council, was removed from office because he had said that the military might have to take "supralegal" actions to defend Japan in the event of a surprise attack or in other circumstances.

Shin Kanemaru, director general of the Japanese Defense Agency, rebuked the general publicly and said that his comments had created a misunderstanding about civilian control of the armed forces.

It was the first dismissal in Japan's postwar history of such a high-ranking military official and underscored the unusual public debate over defense issues that has arisen this year.

Kurisu has been a leader of those advocating a reappraisal of Japan's defense posture, which was fixed in the early 1950s. Generally, it provides only for self-defense forces. The constitution prohibits offensive weapons.

Kurisu has publicly challenged several of the underlying assumptions, asserting at one point that it is difficult to distinguish between defensive and offensive weapons. He has tried to upgrade the status of his own office and of the military generally, once seeking direct access on a regular basis to the prime minister.

For the past three decades, public discussion of such issues has been rare in Japan. Since last January, however, the government of Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda has seemed to encourage the defense debate and it was assumed by many observers that Kurisu's outspoken remarks had tacit approval at the highest levels. There were those who felt he may have been floating trial balloons on behalf of the administration.

In the latest confrontation, however, Kurisu implied a challenge to the fundamental rule of the military by civilian officials.

In an interview with a weekly magazine, Kurisu said that commanders might have to take "supralegal" actions on their own authority in certain events. As examples, he mentioned protecting a Japanese fishing boat or responding to the approach of an aircraft from a potential enemy.

The law governing the Japanese self-defense forces states that only the prime minister can order a military action.

In announcing Kurisu's removal yesterday, Kanemaru said that no "supralegal" action could be permitted by military officers even in the event of an enemy surprise attack.

In a news conference later, Kurisu defended his remarks and said he had been prepared to resign if Kanemaru disagreed with them.

"I have said what I thought was right since I became chairman of the Joint Staff Council," he told reporters. Field commanders should have the power to repel a surprise attack without waiting for orders from civilian officials, he said.

He said he was not challenging the rule of civilian control over the military, but was merely discussing powers that commanders should have before civilian leaders can exert that control in an emergency.

A veteran military officer who is said to be popular with many uniformed colleagues, Kurisu, 58, has been in trouble since the day he was appointed chairman of the council which oversees ground, sea and air forces.

On his appointment last October, he announced that the post of chairman should be attested by the emperor as are those of Cabinet ministers and said he would go to the imperial palace to write his own name in the registry of high-ranking public officials. He was refused permission to do so.

Later, Kurisu insisted that the Joint Staff Council chairman should have direct access to the prime minister instead of making reports through civilian ministers. His civilian superior said he should not have that right.

In a subsequent controversy, he declared that Japan should have the right to "attack the other side's bases" to defend itself if attacked, a position many felt violated the premise that Japan can have only defensive weapons.

Kurisu is a graduate of Tokyo University and a veteran of service in the Imperial Navy in World War II. In 1951, he joined the police reserve force, predecessor of the self-defense forces, and later was military attache in Paris.

In October 1976, he was promoted to chief of staff of the ground self defense forces and elevated a year later to the council chairmanship.

JAPAN'S STAFF CHIEF IS FORCED TO RESIGN

TOKYO.—Gen. Hiroomi Kurisu, chairman of the Joint Staff Council, was dismissed today for having said that the Japanese armed forces might act on their own in case of a surprise attack.

Shin Kanemaru, the civilian head of the Defense Agency, said the general's statement had created misunderstanding regarding civilian control of the armed forces. Unauthorized action, he said, would not be permitted even if Japan were under a sudden attack. Under Japanese law, only the Prime Minister can order troop deployments.

In the statement, made in an interview with a weekly magazine, General Kurisu had said:

"I do not believe that the first-line Self-Defense Forces will sit idly by if the country comes under surprise attack. I believe the Self-Defense Forces would without hesitation take prompt supralegal action if Japan were attacked by surprise."

GENERAL DEFENDS HIS REMARKS

Today, at a news conference, he said that the remark had been misunderstood and that he had not questioned civilian control. He added:

"I have said what I thought was right since I became chairman of the Joint Staff Council. I was ready to quit if my remarks were not welcomed by the director general of the Defense Agency."

General Kurisu explained that there would be a time lag between a surprise attack and authorized defense action. In theory, he said, forces might be instructed in advance to retreat when attacked, but training is not possible on that basis and, moreover, under present law, not even officers are empowered to order a retreat in case of an attack.

Officers expressed shock over the forced resignation of General Kurisu, whose position is comparable to that of chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff in the United States. A senior council member said General Kurisu had been made a scapegoat, adding that "we should speak out more" about defense policy. A colonel said the general had merely stated the legal obstacles that might prevent prompt reaction in case of a surprise attack.

General Kurisu will be succeeded as chairman by Gen. Takehiko Takashina, chief of staff of ground forces.

Mr. HAYAKAWA. I thank the Chair.

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, "He who fails to heed the errors of History is destined to repeat them." It would appear that we are on the verge of revalidating this truth by following the same path in Korea that gave us a legacy of 50,000 coffins in the 1950's. The fact that we are here today to debate whether or not the Congress will give its approval to the administration's plan to withdraw ground forces from South Korea demonstrates the truthfulness of the aforementioned statement.

I think that it can be safely said that there is no more strategic territory in all of Asia than the Korean Peninsula. Standing as both a bridge and a barrier between the oceanic and continental Pacific worlds, its importance has been appreciated by Asian powers for over 100 years. This is what concerns me so greatly. President Carter, hardly in office, decided in early 1977 that the United States should withdraw its remaining ground forces from South Korea. In a press conference on May 26, 1977, the President stated:

I think it is accurate to say that the time has come for a very careful, very orderly withdrawal over a period of four to five years of ground troops, leaving intact an adequate degree of strength in the Republic of Korea to withstand any foreseeable attack and making it clear to the North Koreans, the Chinese, the Soviets, that our commitment to South Korea is undeviating and is staunch.

I do not see this decision as "making it clear * * * that our commitment to South Korea is undeviating and is staunch." What I see is a show of weakness, a demonstration of a lack of American resolve to uphold our commitment to our allies. I am concerned that this move may become the norm as opposed to the exception. It may be Korea now, but Europe may be the next victim. For many years, former Senator Mike Mansfield argued to bring home our troops from abroad, that the cost was more than we could afford, and throughout those years the Congress and the administration refused to listen to this demand. But now, when there is no voice in Congress crying out for such action, we find it is the President who initiates the call.

Let us ask our military leaders about such a decision. It was only a little over a year ago that Maj. Gen. John Singlaub, then Commander of U.S. forces in Korea, spoke out against the President's decision. We all know the fate of General Singlaub, he is now retired from the military, forced out because he refused to remain quiet in the face of actions that may well prove to be deleterious to the future security of the United States. Other military leaders learned quickly from the Singlaub affair. Criticism was stifled, even though in a letter to me, the President indicated his administration "would not stifle dissent."

If he failed to receive advice from the military, where did this policy originate? It appears that the genesis of the idea came from the now famous document, PRM–10. While most of the focus was on PRM–10's recommendations for Western Europe, it also recommended that the United States withdraw from Korea. This would then afford the United States the luxury of deciding how much involvement we would commit to, in the event of an attack by North Korea. Lest you doubt the intentions of North Korea and its leader Kim Il Sung, I refer you to Senator GLENN's and Senator HUMPHREY's report on this subject. On page 31 of this report, they list some of the buildups the North Koreans have made in recent years:

1. North Korea's decision to produce and import massive numbers of offensive weapons, such as tanks, APC's and mobile artillery.

2. North Korea is thought to store enough supplies to sustain an attack on the South for from 30 to 90 days without resupply from the U.S.S.R. or China, depending upon the duration and intensity of the war.

3. North Korean divisions along the DMZ are in an attack posture.

4. North Koreans make major efforts to keep their tactical communications impenetrable.

5. Forward hardened airfields have been built.

6. Large bunkers have been built well forward along the DMZ to house long-range artillery capable of hitting ROK radar and defensive positions.

7. North Korea now has significant amounts of river crossing equipment.

Each of these points alone would be enough to cause concern, but together they point to a single unmistakable fact, North Korea plans to invade South Korea and as soon as the U.S. ground forces withdraw, they will be free to do so.

As I mentioned earlier, Korea is an important strategic position. The security of all free Asia hinges on the Koreans checking the Communists. The Japanese, while soft-spoken on an issue that they have no real say in, realize that withdrawal will have an adverse effect upon Japan. For this reason they are quietly expressing their concern. In 1975, the Ford-Miki communique called South Korea's security essential to peace in Northeast Asia. In 1977, when Vice President MONDALE visited Tokyo, Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda said the "Korean situation deeply affects the peace and stability of East Asia, including Japan."

What many of our allies in Asia see is a weakening of U.S. commitment to this area of the world. Since the end of the Vietnam war, there has been a growing tendency to move away from any reminders of the U.S. experience in Asia, hence, a movement now to withdraw U.S. forces from Korea. This feeling is being felt by nations all over the world. They perceive a rather weak United States, lessening its resolve, and in reality, abrogating its responsibility as a world power. Time and again, the Carter administration has fueled this feeling:

First. Decision to withdraw from Korea;

Second. Virtual payment to Panama to take the canal off our hands;

Third. The information made available about PRM–10;

Fourth. Lack of a strong negotiating position at SALT;

Fifth. Neutron bomb decision; and Sixth. Cancellation of the B–1.

All of these add up to show an America that is receding from the world spotlight. An America that is shirking its duty. Now is the time to take a stand and halt this foolishness. Mr. President, I urge all of my colleagues to support Senator PERCY's amendment for the good of the Nation and the free world everywhere.●

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, due to the hour and due to the fact that we did work out a compromise on this in which we all can join, I wonder if the Senator from Illinois has been asked and urged by vitiating the order for the yeas and nays?

Mr. PERCY. No; the Senator from Illinois has been asked and urged by several of his colleagues to have a rollcall vote on this. I think it is important that we have as strong a rollcall vote as we possibly can, and I want to go ahead with it. The Senator from Illinois is quite willing to yield back the remainder of his time. I think there are no further Senators on this side who wish to speak.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator from Ohio is willing to yield back his time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time is yielded back. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, of the Senator from Illinois. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) would vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. MATHIAS), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER) would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 81, nays 7, as follows:

So Mr. PERCY's amendment (No. UP 1514), as modified, was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Are there further amendments?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has an amendment he would like to call up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1515

(Purpose: To amend the Mutual Security Act of 1954 with respect to the use of foreign currency)

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1515.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

USE OF FOREIGN CURRENCY

SEC. 26. (a) Section 502(b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1754(b)), is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, local currencies owned by the United States, which are in excess of the amounts reserved under section 612(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, and of the requirements of the United States Government in payment of its obligations outside the United States, as such requirements may be determined from time to time by the President (and any other local currencies owned by the United States in amounts not to exceed the equivalent of $75 per day per person or the maximum per diem allowance for employees of the United States Government while traveling in a foreign country established under authority of subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, whichever is greater, exclusive of the actual cost of transportation) shall be made available to Members and employees of the Congress for their local currency expenses when authorized by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Majority Leader of the Senate, the Minority Leader of the Senate, or the chairman of any committee of the House of Representatives or the Senate or of any joint committee of the Congress. Whenever local currencies owned by the United States are not otherwise available for purposes of this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase such local currencies as may be necessary for such purposes, using any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"(2) Within the first sixty days that the Congress is in session in each calendar year, the chairman of each committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate and of each joint committee of the Congress shall prepare a consolidated report itemizing the amounts and dollar equivalent values of each foreign currency expended and the amounts of dollar expenditures from appropriated funds in connection with travel outside the United States, together with the purposes of the expenditures, including per diem (lodging and meals), transportation, and other purposes, and showing the total itemized expenditures during the preceding calendar year of such committee, and of each Member or employee of such committee, and shall forward such consolidated report to the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives (if the committee is a committee of the House of Representatives or a joint committee whose funds are disbursed by the Clerk of the House) or to the Secretary of the Senate (if the committee is a committee of the Senate or a joint committee whose funds are disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate). Each such consolidated report shall be open to public inspection and shall be published in the Congressional Record within ten legislative days after it is forwarded pursuant to this paragraph. In the case of the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate and the Permanent Select Committee on Intellignce of the House of Representatives, such consolidated report may, in the discretion of the chairman of such committee, omit such information as would identify the foreign countries in which Members and employees of such committees traveled.

"(3)(A) Each Member or employee who receives an authorization under paragraph (1) from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Majority Leader of the Senate, or the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall, within thirty days after the completion of the travel involved, submit a report setting forth the information specified in paragraph (2), to the extent applicable, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives (in the case of a Member of the House or an employee whose salary is disbursed by the Clerk of the House) or the Secretary of the Senate (in the case of a Member of the Senate or an employee whose salary is disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate). In the case of an authorization for a group of Members or employees, such report shall be submitted for all Members of the group by its chairman, or if there is no designated chairman, by the ranking Member or, if the group does not include a Member, by the senior employee in the group.

"(B) Within the first sixty days that the Congress is in session in each calendar year, the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall prepare a consolidation of the reports received by them under this paragraph with respect to expenditures during the preceding calendar year by each Member and employee, or by each group, in the case of expenditures made on behalf of a group which are not allocable to individual members of the group. Each such consolidation shall be open to public inspection and shall be published in the Congressional Record within ten legislative days after its completion.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "Sec. 26. Effective Date. The" and insert in lieu thereof "Sec. 27. Effective Date. Except with respect to the amendment made by section 26,".

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, in an opinion dated May 11, 1977, the Comptroller General advised that certain procedures for funding congressional travel under section 502(b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended, were not legally authorized. As a consequence, on May 25, 1977, the Senate approved Senate Resolution 179 which authorized payment from the contingent fund of the Senate for transportation costs and travel expenses incurred by Members and employees of the Senate when engaged in authorized foreign travel.

Since Senate Resolution 179 was a temporary measure, the leadership and the chairmen of committees having jurisdiction over this matter directed appropriate staff to draft language which could be incorporated into law.

Mr. President, the amendment I am submitting today is designed as a permanent measure to govern the use of appropriated funds and U.S.-owned local currencies for Senators and employees engaged in authorized foreign travel. It has the support of the Senate leadership and I am prepared to accept it on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

I understand that the amendment is acceptable to Senator CASE also.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I am authorized to state that the amendment is acceptable to the ranking minority member.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1516

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I call up my amendment which is at the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), for himself, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. STONE, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. GRIFFIN, and Mr. THURMOND, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1516.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

SEC. 26. (a) The Congress finds that:

1. A lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict is vital to United States' national interests as well as to the interests of the states of the region; and

2. Support for a strong and secure Israel and the maintenance for this purpose of Israel's effective defense capabilities as essential to peace remains a fundamental tenet of United States foreign policy; and

3. Direct, face-to-face negotiations between Israel and Egypt without preconditions is an historic opening for peace, and the support of such negotiations by other moderate Arab states, can best promote a peace settlement based on mutual concessions and accommodation; and

4. The establishment of secure, recognized and defensible borders between Israel and its neighbors will discourage hostilities; and

5. Full, normalized relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors, including trade, travel, tourism, communications and diplomatic relations are vital for peace.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should continue as mediator to promote direct negotiations between Israel and Egypt and to encourage other Arab states to enter into negotiations leading to peace treaties with Israel; and that the United States should be responsive to Israel's economic needs and defense requirements including the provision of additional advanced aircraft, to maintain Israel's defense capability which is essential to peace.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "SEC. 26" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 27".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair ask, is this the amendment on which there is a time limitation of 30 minutes?

Mr. BAKER. That is correct. I will say for the benefit of my colleagues that I do not expect to require 30 minutes, but I will ask at this time for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, this amendment is offered on behalf of myself and Senators CHURCH, CRANSTON, JAVITS, the distinguished occupant of the Chair, Mr. STONE, and Mr. CHAFEE. I ask unanimous consent to add Senators BROOKE, MATHIAS, METZENBAUM, WALLOP, LUGAR, SCHMITT, HEINZ, ROTH, PERCY, HAYAKAWA, MUSKIE, and DOMENICI.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I believe it is appropriate to amend S. 3075 in order to incorporate a resolution that reaffirms the sense of the Senate that the interests of the United States will be best served by continuing to encourage direct negotiations between the Governments of Israel and Egypt in their search for a lasting peace in the Middle East. This resolution reemphasizes once more our commitment to the survival of an Israel protected by defensible and recognized borders. It also reaffirms our belief that the only peace that can be a lasting peace will be a peace based on an agreement between the parties after negotiations that are free of pressure, preconceptions, and imposition of anyone except the parties to the conflict. The role of the United States is to bring the parties together in an atmosphere conducive to mutual agreement. And this resolution supports the President and the Secretary of State in their efforts to do just that.

This resolution, Mr. President, is also designed to encourage both parties to be forthcoming, generous, and innovative in their efforts to arrive at a settlement. This resolution should encourage the Government of Israel to take whatever realistic steps are necessary to assure accommodation of the parties, in the realization that the U.S. Government has once again recorded its commitment to her survival in peace and integrity. Our increasingly close ties to Egypt and our endorsement of President Sadat's peace initiative should also encourage the Government of Egypt to do her part in revitalizing fruitful negotiations between the parties.

Mr. DANFORTH. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I am happy to yield.

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I think this is a very useful amendment in that it states quite clearly what I believe to be our interests in the Middle East, furthering face-to-face negotiations, defensible borders between Israel and its neighbors, and reiterating our country's strong support for the State of Israel.

There are only two words in this amendment that give me pause. That is that in the amendment it states that it is the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States should continue as mediator to promote direct negotiations between Israel and Egypt.

The words that bother me are the two words "as mediator."

It would appear to me, Mr. President, that these two words really add nothing to the sense of the amendment and perhaps detract from its import. I think that while the United States should be promoting direct negotiations between Israel and its Arab neighbors, we should not insist that in those negotiations we serve a third-party role, constantly serving as mediator, constantly interposing our position between that of Israel and Egypt.

I think that the danger of serving as a mediator in those negotiations is that frequently the parties that are most directly involved would tend not to negotiate with each other but through each other in making appeals to the United States.

Therefore, I wonder if the minority leader would consider deleting from the resolution the two words "as mediator." I might say I have checked this with each of the signers of the "Dear Colleague" letter, and the unanimous view is that either they would have no objection to deleting those two words or they think the deletion would be a positive step.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if I may respond to the distinguished Senator from Missouri, I think his observation is accurate and his conclusion is correct. I think the words are superfluous and that simple deletion of those two words would improve the meaning and the clarity of the resolution.

If it is agreeable to the distinguished manager of the bill (Mr. CHURCH), I shall be glad at this time to ask unanimous consent that, since the yeas and nays have been ordered, the two words appearing on line 2 of paragraph (b) on page 2, to wit, "as mediator", be stricken from the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 31, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

SEC. 26. (a) The Congress finds that:

1. A lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict is vital to United States' national interests as well as to the interests of the states of the region; and

2. Support for a strong and secure Israel and the maintenance for this purpose of Israel's effective defense capabilities as essential to peace remains a fundamental tenet of United States foreign policy; and

3. Direct, face-to-face negotiations between Israel and Egypt without preconditions is an historic opening for peace, and the support of such negotiations by other moderate Arab states, can best promote a peace settlement based on mutual concessions and accommodation; and

4. The establishment of secure, recognized and defensible borders between Israel and its neighbors will discourage hostilities; and

5. Full, normalized relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors, including trade, travel, tourism, communications and diplomatic relations are vital for peace.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should continue to promote direct negotiations between Israel and Egypt and to encourage other Arab states to enter into negotiations leading to peace treaties with Israel; and that the United States should be responsive to Israel's economic needs and defense requirements including the provision of additional advanced aircraft, to maintain Israel's defense capability which is essential to peace.

On page 31, line 6, strike out "SEC. 26" and insert in lieu thereof "SEC. 27".

Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, on that basis, I ask unanimous consent that I be listed as a cosponsor of this amendment.

I see Senator JACKSON is on the floor. We spoke about this earlier and he stated to me at that time that if these two words were deleted from the resolution, he, too, would like to be included as a cosponsor.

Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I be added as a cosponsor, with the same understanding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Washington are added as cosponsors.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, when the Senate refused to disapprove the $4.8 billion package sale of modern warplanes to Egypt, Israel, and Saudi Arabia, and by that act put its imprimatur on a new U.S. policy of selling planes to both sides of the Middle East conflict, it raised fears and heightened insecurities in the State of Israel that the U.S. commitment to the security of that country might not continue.

Not only were we now selling weapons to both sides of this conflict, but, also, Congress had been advised that unless it approved of the Saudi and Egyptian sales, President Carter would withdraw the proposed sale of new aircraft to Israel, thus converting what previously had been an unconditional American commitment to Israel security into a highly conditional one.

This change in American policy was totally unexpected, particularly, in view of Israel's prior territorial concessions.

In 1975, pursuant to the Sinai II agreement, Israel yielded back its side of the Suez Canal, restored to the Egyptians the Abu Radis oilfields, and withdrew its army to the Gidi and Mitla passes, with the understanding that the United States would attend to its weapons needs in the future.

No one then suspected that the United States would adopt a policy of arming Egypt or selling F–15's to Saudi Arabia, let alone placing future sales to Israel in an Arab package. It is easy to understand, therefore, why the Israelis are deeply troubled and how this may complicate further concessions from them at the bargaining table.

This amendment resolves that it is the sense of the Senate that the United States should continue as a mediator to promote direct negotiations between Israel and Egypt and to encourage other Arab States to enter into negotiations leading to peace treaties with Israel. It further resolves that the United States should be responsive to Israel's economic and defense needs in order to maintain Israel's defense capability which is essential to peace.

An amendment of this kind will be reassuring to Israel, shaken as it is by that Mideast arms sales package. It will help remind them that the United States views Israel as a valuable ally, one whose security is in our own national interest. It will help to encourage further face-to-face negotiations at a time when much encouragement is necessary. As such, it might help promote the prospects for peace in the Middle East.

So I hope that the Senate will see fit to adopt the amendment.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the distinguished Senator from Maine (Mr. MUSKIE) and the distinguished Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) be added as cosponsors.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. BAKER. I yield.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I think the Senator has done a fine thing in giving many, many Senators who took differing attitudes to the jet aircraft deal with Saudi Arabia and Egypt an opportunity to express themselves and associate themselves again with what has frequently been called a fundamental tenet of the foreign policy of the United States, the security and the national integrity of Israel. I think this is a fine service.

There are so many confused currents. I think this is a clear, pure stream of 30-plus years of history through that confusion. It is very helpful. I am extremely pleased that the Senator has taken this action and I am honored to be associated with it.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, it is a particular pleasure to me to acknowledge my debt of gratitude to the distinguished Senator from New York for his assistance in this matter, and for his advice and counsel, not only on this matter but in a range of matters on foreign policy and domestic policy. I want to say once again it is a distinct honor and pleasure to be associated with him.

Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield for a question?

Mr. CHURCH. Yes.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I am very interested. We have had a lot of amendments. We have authorized a lot of things backwards and forwards. What is the total of the bill now?

Mr. CHURCH. The latest tabulation shows the total to be approximately $2,900 million.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I merely want to warn Members of the Senate that it is nice to have all your amendments and authorize a lot of this money, but the Committee on Appropriations is going to take a good, long look at a lot of these items. I want to warn also that I think they will be cut considerably.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, with regard to the remarks of the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I observe that this amendment does not cost anything and that, pursuant to his suggestion that it may be cut, since there is no money here, he is not talking about this, but others.

Mr. MAGNUSON. I said we are going to look at this very, very carefully.

Mr. BAKER. We always listen very carefully to the distinguished chairman.

Mr. President, I have no further use for my time. I yield it back.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I yield back my time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified. The yeas and nays have been ordered. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), the Senator from Colorado (Mr. HASKELL), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 87, nays 0, as follows:

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1517

(Purpose: Technical correction of Case-Javits perfecting amendment to Hayakawa amendment)

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I have an amendment at the desk and I ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from New Jersey (Mr. CASE) proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1517.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate is not in order.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, may we have order? I would like to hear the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina is correct. The Senate is not in order. The Senate will kindly come to order. Will Senators conversing show courtesy to our colleagues and take their conversations to the cloakrooms so that business can proceed?

The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I call up the amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk has stated the amendment.

Mr. CASE. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was trying to get order. The clerk will state the amendment again.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill, adopt a new section——

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendments be dispensed with.

Mr. HELMS. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is heard.

The clerk will state the entire amendment.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add the following new section:

"SEC. 27. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, subsections (b) and (c) of section 5 of the United Nations participation Act of 1945 shall remain in force."

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I move the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. HELMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I certainly intend to cause the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, my good friend, no grief on this amendment, but I want to point out that for about 5 hours the Senate is on record as having reinstated the Byrd chrome amendment and that correction is what is involved in this so-called technical amendment.

I have no objection to the amendment, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to what we are doing here and what we did.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is all time yielded back?

Mr. CASE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. All time having been yielded back, the question is on agreeing to UP amendment No. 1517 of the Senator from New Jersey.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CASE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

THE UNITED STATES' ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, the Senate voted yesterday to lift the United States' arms embargo against Turkey. I joined the majority in approving this action 57–42.

The various problems surrounding the issue of lifting or retaining the Turkish embargo are by no means simple. While there are compelling arguments on both sides of the controversy, there are too many imponderables for one to speak with any degree of certainty on either side.

After extensive consideration of all the major arguments on each side, I reached the conclusion that the best interests of the United States and the NATO alliance would be served by lifting the embargo and at the same time a resolution of the differences between Greece and Turkey would more likely be achieved.

I am not unmindful of the strong, thoughtful and sincere arguments on the other side. It comes down to a judgment call over which perfectly reasonable people can differ.

In my judgment, the arms embargo was a proper and effective response to Turkey's invasion of Cyprus when enacted in 1974. However, in 1978 it has become an obstacle to United States and allied security interests, stable relations between the United States, Greece, and Turkey, and a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

The strength and cohesion of the NATO alliance have suffered because of the disarray in its southern flank. Greece left the NATO military umbrella altogether in the wake of the Turkish invasion, and the arms ban has contributed to a crippling of Turkey's military capabilities, notwithstanding its partial lifting in 1975–78. Allied security needs require the effective participation of both countries, but that will not come before frictions between Greece and Turkey are substantially reduced.

Congress central purpose in imposing the embargo was to put pressure on Turkey to end its military occupation of Cyprus and bargain in good faith for a negotiated settlement. It has not worked. No progress has been made in resolving the Cyprus question, and there are no prospects for a settlement. It is clearly time for a new approach, and removing the embargo presents the best opportunity available for breaking the impasse. Moreover, resolution of other conflicts between Greece and Turkey—at least as important in their effect on bilateral relations—awaits a Cyprus settlement. Chief among these is their quarrel over continental shelf rights in the Aegean.

Fears have been raised, however, that the United States will lose any real influence over a Cyprus solution once the linkage between U.S. arms and Turkish concessions is broken. This, I think, is not the case. Security assistance funding must be authorized and appropriated by the Congress each year. Indeed, the legislation approved by the Senate yesterday directs the President to provide Congress with 60-day reports on the Cyprus question, and requires that he accompany any future funding requests for the region with a detailed certification that substantial progress toward a settlement has been achieved, or that the proposed assistance would contribute to its achievement.

The majority in the Senate voted to lift the embargo on assurance that Turkey will proceed to negotiate fairly and in good faith.

If Turkey fails to be forthcoming in her negotiations, the Congress has the power, which I am satisfied we will exercise, to cut off military aid to Turkey.

I urge that an editorial from the Washington Post be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

LIFT THE TURKISH EMBARGO

Jimmy Carter was right on the mark when he said the forthcoming Senate vote to lift the Turkish arms embargo is the most important piece of foreign-affairs business the Congress has left in this session. It's really quite simple. If the embargo is lifted, diplomacy gets a chance to start healing the wounds in Cyprus, the rent in Turkish-Greek relations, the strain in Turkish-American and Greek-American relations, and NATO's whole sorry disrray in the eastern Mediterranean. If the embargo stays on, everything gets worse.

The argument has been cast in pro-Turkish and pro-Greek terms, but that is misleading. There is a great deal in it for both Turkey and Greece, and for both Turkish and Greek communities on Cyprus, if the stalemate signified by the embargo is broken. The United States has gone to considerable lengths to make that case, explaining the vista that a lifting of the embargo would open, removing the previous administration's pro-Turkish tilt in military aid, and supporting Greece's wish not to be muscled by Turkey in their Aegean Sea dispute. The administration has also labored, successfully, to induce the Turks to offer a new Cyprus position conducive to negotiations. Ankara's position is not yet what Athens and the Greek Cypriots want it to be. The way to imorove it is by the talks that would surely follow a lifting of the embargo.

The Greek lobby is hanging tough. That has led Sen. George McGovern (D-S.D.) to offer an imaginative way out. Mr. McGovern can hardly be regarded as someone dominated by the strategic concerns that, for good reason, guide the views of many others who wish to end the embargo. He is sympathetic to the division and hardship on Cyprus. Mr. McGovern suggests lifting the embargo, while linking future Turkish-aid requests (including arms sales) to a presidenial certification of good-faith diplomacy. His amendment is designed to eliminate the stigma that the embargo is for Turkey, but to retain a nonhumiliating form of encouragement to the Turks to continue moderating their policy. The administration supports this approach.

Let us underline the essential point. The embargo was at its outset a well-meant, legally mandated protest against the use of American arms for the occupation of almost half of Cyprus. But experience has proven it to be destructive of the purpose it was meant to serve—reducing the occupation—and of much else. The embargo stands now simply as a hostile act against an ally, and one not in the slightest endorsed by any other NATO ally—except for Greece. The Senate should end it in the manner suggested by Mr. McGovern.

THE RULE OF LAW AND THE ARMS EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY

Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, 1978 has been a year in which the Senate has played a key role in foreign policy unparalleled by any other single year during my 16 years of service in this Chamber. Never before has the Senate participated more fully or forcefully in shaping the future course of our Nation's diplomatic efforts in Latin America, Africa, and the Middle East. This process has not been an easy one, nor has its importance been fully understood. As the result of legislative initiatives we have reassumed the responsibility which comes from being a full partner with the President in formulation of foreign policy. That responsibility has not been an easy one and no one said it would be.

Our own heritage—our Constitution, the Bill of Rights, the legal underpinnings of due process of law and reliance on the rule of law—have imbued our own diplomatic efforts with a distinct character. Upholding the rule of law in an essentially lawless world has been a never-ending and frustrating task. Nor should we believe that it is a uniquely American one. Other nations properly judge our own commitment to the rule of law by the effort we make to fully apply our own laws in pursuit of justice at home and abroad. We see the pursuit of this goal continue today on the floor of the Senate. Whether this involves the United States continuing to abide by the international obligations stipulated by the United Nations Security Council's economic sanctions against Rhodesia or lifting the partial arms embargo we are imposing against Turkey because of her violation of section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act, the desire of the American people to live by the rule of law takes on an enduring character transcending the expediency of the moment.

On the face of such considerations there should be little question but that Turkey should remain subject to the arms embargo Congress has imposed. Nevertheless, my decision to vote to continue the partial embargo was not an easy one. It was not easy because the tragedy of Cyprus is not a simple story and the proposal which the President has made in an effort to facilitate a fair settlement of this problem and strengthen the NATO alliance was not without considerable merit.

On the issue of Cyprus, I think all fairminded observers agree that neither side to the dispute can claim "clean hands." The Greek junta's coup against Archbishop Makarios in 1974 in order to realize the dream of "enosis"—union of Cyprus with Greece—prompted a military response by Turkey in order to provide for the protection of the Turkish Cypriot community on the island republic. Unfortunately, Turkey undertook a second invasion of the island in August 1974 in the midst of negotiations and in violation of article I of the NATO Charter calling for the settlement of disputes by parties to the alliance through negotiations. Turkish forces remain on the island today in violation of United Nations Resolution 3212 calling for the withdrawal of foreign military forces. This reckless action by Turkey, made possible by the use of American weapons, left Congress no choice in 1974 but to impose an arms embargo against a NATO ally. Because Turkey is a vital member of the alliance, this decision was a painful one, as was the vote of yesterday. However, the military adventure embarked upon by Turkey resulted not in a political settlement of the Cyprus problem but only further atrocities, bloodshed, and, most important from the United States security perspective, a destabilization of NATO's southeastern flank.

In 1975, my colleagues will recall that the Senate voted to partially lift the arms embargo by allowing limited foreign military sales credits to be extended to Turkey. I opposed that relaxation of the embargo because it sorely undercut the firmness of our commitment to the rule of law. At that time, we were told that such a display of flexibility on our part would permit the Turks and Turkish Cypriots to make the concessions necessary in order to solve the massive refugee problem on the island, pave the way for withdrawal of Turkish military forces, and promote a fair and lasting settlement on the island. However, today thousands of Turkish military forces remain. The Turkish Cypriots, who account for 18 percent of the population, occupy 36 percent of the island and 200,000 Greek Cypriots cannot return to their homes in once-thriving communities such as Varosha. While there has been a recent proposal by the Turkish Cypriots to talk about Greek Cypriot return to Varosha under U.N. auspices, the fact is that Cyprus remains a partitioned island.

Mr. President, I agree with many proponents of the proposal to lift the embargo against Turkey who state that we must do all in our power to facilitate an end to the political stalemate on the island in order to reduce the human suffering and remove this dangerous dispute with the assistance of U.N. Secretary General Waldheim. But I do not believe it is either necessary or desirable to lift the rule of law embargo in order to achieve this result. Nor do I believe that continuation of the partial embargo will drive the Turks into the arms of the Soviet Union despite the recent visit to the U.S.S.R. by President Ecevit. Turkey has wisely indicated that it has no desire to withdraw from NATO and pursue a relationship with an historic enemy. Greece and Turkey both realize that the Warsaw Pact is a common threat and that Cyprus continues to be a problem which prevents both of these NATO members from becoming full-fledged members of the Common Market. Such common interests argue ever forcefully that the Turkish force of occupation on Cyprus would be more wisely deployed to reinforce Turkey's borders with the Soviet Union and Bulgaria.

Mr. President, the NATO alliance is a security organization of free nations dedicated to defend themselves collectively against attack and to use the rule of law to serve the cause of justice. The United States is the world's most powerful country and the leading member of this alliance. As such we have special responsibilities. And because we are a great power we must be able and willing to incur temporary strategic disadvantage in order to sustain our credibility as a leader.

Lifting the arms embargo against Turkey at a time when that country remains in violation of the NATO Charter, U.N. Resolution 3212, and section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act, can only damage the credibility of our public commitment to uphold the rule of law. For surely, if we are unwilling to enforce our own laws how can we expect others to do it for us? How can we be sure that Saudi Arabia or Egypt or Iran or any other nation receiving U.S. weapons will scrupulously abide by the prohibitions and limitations we have prescribed as a condition for the receipt of those weapons?

Mr. President, I have concluded that if we do not continue the partial embargo a disturbing and negative signal will be transmitted to those countries now heavily armed by the United States. This situation is not desirable because it effectively reduces the control which we have and should have after those weapons are transferred. The maintenance of U.S. credibility regarding arms restrictions is essential to reducing the level of conflict not only in the eastern Mediterranean, but around the world. Simply put, we should uphold the rule of law until justice is won. To do otherwise may cause even greater problems than Cyprus in the future for this Nation and the world.●

DOD ACCOUNTING PROBLEMS

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, last week Business Week magazine published an article on the Defense Department's accounting problems with foreign military sales. According to the article, Defense may have lost track of up to $30 billion in undelivered foreign orders for weapons. After reading the article, I asked the Director of the Defense Security Assistance Agency for a response. In his letter to me of July 21, 1978, DSAA Director, Lt. Gen. Ernest Graves, concludes that the Department of Defense recognized and acted to correct such accounting problems some time ago.

I ask that both the Business Week article and General Graves' response be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

THE CASE OF THE MISPLACED $30 BILLION

A major scandal may soon be erupting out of the Defense Dept.'s management of the U.S. foreign-military sales program. Defense officials, it appears, have lost track of up to $30 billion in undelivered foreign orders for weapons, equipment, and U.S. support services. What they do not know, because their books are so fouled up, is whether the unaccounted for money is the result of a series of ghastly accounting errors, whether they have spent a lot of it for something else, or whether they have been undercharging foreign customers—or a combination of all three.

"This has all the lethal potential of a loose cannon rolling around our deck," confesses Clifford J. Miller, the Defense Dept.'s deputy comptroller for plans and systems and the man in charge of a belated attempt to try to straighten out the mess. Miller has a tough job—the Pentagon housecleaning follows mounting pressure from Congress, the General Accounting Office (GAO), and the White House to bring some order to the system. And he has to corral records as they exist in bits and pieces in the unkempt and apparently inadequate books of the Army, Navy, and Air Force, and then organize them, for the first time ever, into a coherent, single accounting system. In the process, he admits, he may find not only serious problems but also illegalities in some of the services' transactions.

TO THE LAST GUN

There is no question that all three services are guilty of sloppy bookkeeping. They have, for years, fuzzed the distinction between the contracting authority they have been given through the U.S. Foreign Military Sales Trust Fund to buy weapons for foreign governments and the authority that they annually receive from Congress to purchase weapons for themselves. In some cases, they cannot even distinguish whose money is buying which weapons—and for whom.

"The sad fact is that we don't really know how big this [confusion] really is," says Miller. "It probably will be five years before we'll be able to sort [it all] out." The Defense Dept., he charges lacks data not only on what arms each of the services has been shipping overseas in any given year but also on what they have been letting out in contracts to U.S. weapons producers on behalf of foreign arms buyers.

In addition, the department cannot tell precisely what the services have been spending and collecting their money for, or whether they have been accurately billing arms buyers. Miller says he does not even know "whether we can tell the difference all the way down the line between foreign money and our money in the [military's procurement] system."

GAO EVIDENCE

According to Miller, the Defense Dept. is forcing the services to try to give details on at least 16,000 foreign sales that they have made over the past five or six years. "We want them to account for those transactions right down to every last tank gun and airplane engine that's still in the contracting pipeline," he says. But he wonders if they can. And he confesses to worrying about what they may turn up in the process.

In this concern, he has supporters at the GAO who have already turned up evidence that the Pentagon has defaulted on collecting millions of dollars as a result of not having billed, or of underbilling foreign governments for training troops to use U.S. weapons, for transporting military goods, or for the prorated cost of U.S. personnel and U.S. plants and machinery used to make weapons for foreign distribution.

"It wouldn't surprise me," Miller concedes, "if we find we've been giving away a lot of stuff that we should have been selling. On the other hand, we may also find that our foreign weapons buyers may have to ante up for huge contractor-cost overruns that they—and we—aren't even aware of."

The management failure that lies at the root of the arms-sales shambles apparently stems from the fragmented way in which the Defense Dept. is structured to serve as contractor go-between for foreign arms buyers and U.S. weapons manufacturers. The way it works is that, under the loose supervision of the Defense Security Assistance Agency (DSAA), each military service handles its own foreign military sales requests and makes its own purchases. For example, the Army may get an order from the DSAA for 50 Chrysler-manufactured tanks for sale to Israel. It takes that order to Chrysler Corp. and draws against its account of contracting authority with the foreign sales trust fund to make the tank purchase. The Navy does the same thing when it buys ships for U.S. allies, and the Navy and Air Force use the system when they buy fighter aircraft for foreign governments. All three services also use the process in getting money to purchase missiles for foreign buyers.

THE ARMY'S MIX-UP

The U.S. Treasury Dept., as custodian of the actual money in the trust fund, keeps tabs on the fund's fluctuating total. But each service is supposed to keep track of how it disposes of its own contracting authority and also of the cash that it siphons from the fund to pay for weapons.

This is where the breakdown has apparently taken place. The accounting task is gargantuan and seems to have swamped the military. Foreign orders for U.S. arms have topped $10 billion in each of the last five years, and this year they will come to more than $13.2 billion.

"The orders just grew too big too fast," explains one congressional defense budget analyst who is sympathetic to the services' problems but feels that the Pentagon must receive a better accounting of where the money is now. "Before the services could catch their breath," he says, "they had let all those orders get tangled up in their own procurement accounts. The worst offender has been the Army."

Jack E. Hobbs, the Army's Deputy Assistant Secretary for financial management, admits that this may be true. "It has been difficult," he says, "because our foreign weapons-buying business now is almost as big as our own."

The gross figures bear this out. From 1974 through 1977, the Army contracted to buy some $22 billion of military hardware, and of that total, $9 billion was transferred to foreign governments. In 1973, in fact, the Army entered into its books some $600 million of foreign contracting authority to buy helicopters. In that same year, Congress authorized it to spend only $100 million to buy helicopters for its own use.

"Unfortunately," says Hobbs, "all that contracting authority got mixed in together." And as a result, the Army overdrew on its congressional account to pay for helicopters ordered by Iran.

PERIODIC PAYMENTS

In the investigation that followed, it was discovered that many foreign buyers, including Iran, had not been advancing cash into the U.S. trust fund fast enough to cover serial payments to arms manufacturers. This troublemaking situation has now been fixed. All Pentagon contracts written with big weapons buyers now require them to make periodic cash payments to cover all before-delivery outlays. This reserve now totals $4.6 billion and has solved the services' cash-flow problems.

Getting this straightened out, however, did not inspire the Army to end its practice of jumbling foreign and congressional contracting authority. And the resultant mess is now so bad that it probably explains why Army officials are stubbornly resisting pressure to square their service's sales accounts. "The Army wants to cooperate with Miller's office," says one Pentagon official, "but its books are so botched up I doubt if it knows where to begin."

The bleakness of this appraisal is reflected in a recent GAO report that describes the Army's financial management system as approaching "a general breakdown," with considerable emphasis on the chaos in its foreign military sales accounts.

The Army, however, is not the only service in trouble. The Navy, too, acknowledges that it has dumped more than $1 billion of authority given it to buy Litton Industries Inc.'s DD–963 destroyers for Iran into the appropriations pot that Congress gave it to buy destroyers for the U.S. fleet. "We don't expect to find any overwhelming problem getting this straightened out," maintains the Navy's associate budget director, Charles P. Nemfakos. "But we're very concerned, and we're watching things closely."

The Air Force professes little worry about its ledger books. "I don't think we've let anything fall through the cracks in foreign sales," insists Ronald E. Failor, chief of the Air Force's Security Assistance Div. "We could see what was coming back in 1972, so since then, we've kept our foreign orders strictly separate and on a case-by-case basis." The Air Force's only concern about the Pentagon's order to come clean on foreign arms sales transactions, according to Failor, "is that it has meant a mountain of additional work."

RECORD TRANSFER

Defense officials are less sure that the Air Force's ledger books will be able to pass muster, however. "I doubt if any of the services come out unscathed," says one official.

Unlike the Army, which one official describes as being "desperately behind schedule," the Navy and Air Force will probably be able to meet the Sept. 30 deadline that the Defense Dept. has set for them to transfer all their records to a centralized accounting center for foreign military sales—a center set up in Defense two years ago when Congress and the Office of Management and Budget began probing some $13.1 billion in contracting authority for foreign arms that the Pentagon was not spending that year. Why, Congress asked, was the money lying idle at a time when the U.S. economy could have profited from extra cash pumped into it?

The Pentagon explained that the $13.1 billion in question was not unspent cash. Instead, it was contracting authority that it had accumulated for weapons orders, mainly from the Middle East, that would show up in its cash outlays a portion at a time, in future years. Privately, however, Pentagon authorities said they knew that such a sum of unspent money looked bad. So they indulged in some accounting sleight of hand—they wrote the $13.1 billion off their books. When the Pentagon's budget went before Congress for the fiscal 1978 year, it listed only $800 million of contracting authority that the military expected to pay out in cash to fill foreign orders in the 12 months ending this September.

Such will be the practice from now on. The contracting authority that the Air Force got for its recent $4.8 billion order of jet aircraft for Saudi Arabia, Egypt, and Israel, for example, will never show up on the books in one lump sum. Instead, it will appear in annual fractions—in the amounts that the Pentagon expects that it will pay to buy these weapons each year. This will enable the Administration to claim that it is staying under its self-imposed yearly dollar ceilings on such deals and will provide a simpler means of keeping arms-purchase accounts separate.

TERRIFIC INFIGHTING

The task of unsnarling what has gone on is another matter. "Trying to tie the services' old accounting back to the trust fund is a case of 'follow the dancing bear,'" says one OMB spokesman. No one knows that better than Defense's Miller. "The infighting over all this has been terrific," he says. "We're all snarled up."

Then, leaning back in his desk chair, the 54-year-old official muses about life inside the Pentagon—and about those who watched and waited while the foreign arms snafu grew and grew. "You know," he says a trifle wistfully, "no private business would have tolerated this kind of thing. In the business world, everyone involved in anything like this would have been beheaded."

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,
Washington, D.C., July 21, 1978.
Hon. JOHN J. SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This letter is to give you the comments of the Department of Defense on the article about the Foreign Military Sales Program which appeared in the July 24th issue of Business Week magazine.

At the outset, I would like to make clear that the Department has not "misplaced" $30 billion as the headline implies. That figure apparently refers to the total value of undelivered foreign military orders, which amounted to $38 billion on May 31, 1978. Those orders are not misplaced in any sense of the word; the total simply reflects the value of outstanding foreign orders accepted but not yet filled by the Department.

Two years ago, the Department did identify a weakness in the accounting techniques for foreign military sales. The services often combine foreign orders and their own requirements into a single contract. The services' own acquisitions are paid out of Congressional appropriations, while the obligational authority for the foreign goods is the FMS Trust Fund. Unfortunately, the procuring agency has not always kept track of which portions of the contract should be allocated to appropriations and which to the FMS Trust Fund. Consequently, there have been some "paper" accounting errors as the result of charging items to the wrong source of funding.

Such accounting errors have no effect on the amount of money actually collected from a foreign government. The DoD Security Assistance Accounting Center in Denver, Colorado, independently bills foreign customers, manages the trust fund of payments received and disburses progress payments to the Military Departments. The errors did, however, confuse the financial picture of the Military Departments because they could not accurately allocate costs between their two sources of obligational authority.

Several steps have been taken to improve the accounting system for foreign military sales. On June 17, 1977, the Assistant Secretary of Defense (Comptroller) directed the establishment of a uniform accounting system for all Foreign Military Sales transactions on the basis of individual Foreign Military Sales agreements, or cases. The Military Departments have increased their staffs to implement and operate this system, which should be fully operational by next year. Implementing actions are being coordinated with the General Accounting Office to assure that once the system is fully operational it will be in full compliance with all GAO standards governing accounting systems. "Case accounting" will assure proper identification of the source of funding both at the time of contracting and when progress payments are made. In addition, the centralized billing and disbursement activities of the Denver Security Assistance Accounting Center assure proper accounting of the funds available from foreign sales agreements and availability of cash from foreign customers in advance of disbursements for services performed.

One further change in accounting practice is relevant to the situation. Prior to the Fiscal Year 1978 budget presentation the Department followed the practice of picking up as contracting authority the entire value of a foreign military sale in the year the order was signed—even though it was likely that the order would take years to complete. This practice results in overstating annual unobligated funds (by $13.1 billion in FY 1977) and contracts with the appropriations process, where budget obligational authority is normally extended year by year. Accordingly, with the full support of the Office of Management and Budget and the Congressional Committees, the Department in the fall of 1976 revised its budget presentation to give a more accurate and meaningful picture of the planned use of contracting authority in a given year.

This revision had nothing to do with President Carter's ceiling on arms transfers. The Defense Security Assistance Agency has a totally separate accounting system to assure that Foreign Military Sales agreements concluded in Fiscal Year 1978 do not exceed the President's ceiling for non-exempt countries. Under that system, the weapons and weapons-related portion of each Foreign Military Sales "case" agreed to in a fiscal year is charged against the ceiling.

In summary, the Department of Defense recognized and acted to correct accounting problems in the Foreign Military Sales program some time ago. We believe that we have instituted procedures which will correct any remaining deficiencies and will assure sound and effective financial management.

Sincerely,

ERNEST GRAVES,
Lieutenant General, USA, Director, Defense Security Assistance Agency.●

THE VOTES ON RHODESIA

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I stated earlier today my reason for opposing the Helms amendment which would lift United Nations sanctions against Rhodesia for the remainder of this year.

In essence, I believe that we should strongly support the administration's efforts to bring all the parties together in an early ceasefire, in a diplomatic conference; in full, open, and impartial elections; and in an independent, peaceful Rhodesia under majority rule.

In this context, I could not support the compromise introduced by the Senators from New York and New Jersey (Messrs. JAVITS and CASE), or their equivalents. This compromise would still provide for the lifting of sanctions, even in the event of failure to bring all the major parties together. Such a failure would virtually guarantee a continuation of the violence which has beset Rhodesia, and I believe that the United States should have no part in moving that strife-torn nation from the prospect of peace to the likelihood of war.

Not least, we should always bear in mind that the United States sponsored and supported the sanctions adopted by the U.N. Security Council—of which we are a permanent member and in which we enjoy veto power. It ill behooves us to provide for a unilateral lifting of sanctions that were multilaterally adopted, and to which we will continue to be bound until they are multilaterally rescinded.

Therefore, not only the Helms amendment, but even the compromise adopted by the Senate runs counter to our overriding interest in a peaceful settlement and in upholding the integrity of decisions by the Security Council of the United Nations.●

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978, S. 3075

● Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, the international security assistance authorization bill, S. 3075, includes a fiscal year 1979 authorization of $2.9 billion. This legislation, along with other authorization legislation in the international affairs category, needs to be addressed in the context of the budget process for fiscal year 1979.

The fiscal year 1979 first budget resolution targets for the international affairs function are $12.8 billion in budget authority and $6.9 billion in outlays.

If fully funded, the five authorization bills reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, including S. 3075, would exceed these functional totals by about $350 million in budget authority and up to one-half billion dollars in outlays. This takes into account the 5-percent reduction in the International Development Assistance Act, agreed to by the Senate on June 26.

I want to point out to my Senate colleagues, however, that historically the Appropriations Committee has made significant cuts from the authorized levels for most international programs. This process will most likely take care of all the possible budget authority overrun and about $200 million of the possible outlay overage this year as well.

The remaining $300 million of the possible outlay overage would result from a recent administration decision to disburse the fiscal year 1979 economic support for Israel authorized by S. 3075 within the year rather than over several years as proposed in the January budget request and assumed in the first budget resolution.

I will not, therefore, object to the levels authorized by S. 3075. But I am prepared to vote for lower levels this summer when the foreign assistance appropriation bill comes before the Senate.

Up to this point I have discussed the fiscal year 1979 implications of this legislation. There are also future year effects.

If the international development assistance bill, which was passed earlier, and sent to conference, is taken as an example, we can readily see how this year's decisions limit future year spending choices for Congress. Development spending in fiscal year 1979 at the levels authorized in S. 3074, as reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, exceeds the mission totals by about $235 million in budget authority and $55 million in outlays. Over 5 years, however, the cumulative spending recommended for authorization by this bill plus annual reauthorizations at the levels recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations in its March 15 report could exceed the projections accompanying the first budget resolution by $1.5 billion in budget authority and $900 million in outlays.

The administration's projection for international development assistance is even higher. The administration is considering 5-year spending for these programs which exceeds the Committee on Foreign Relations totals by $3 billion in budget authority and $700 million in outlays.

I do not bring this information to the attention of the Senate, because the development assistance bill is the major threat to fiscal planning. It is not. Foreign assistance bills are seldom funded at the authorized levels. This is just one example of how relatively small spending increases in fiscal year 1979—$235 million over the first budget resolution mission budget authority totals and $55 million over mission outlay totals in this case—could over 5 years require $1.5 billion in budget authority and $900 million in outlays more than was contemplated in the congressional budget.

During the next 2 years Congress will be considering, in addition to annual reauthorizations such as this bill and the International Development Assistance Act, several multiyear proposals for international development banks and for international financial programs like the seventh quota increase of the International Monetary Fund. At that time the Senate must carefully examine each proposal for its future year spending implications, as these multiyear authorizations are the major threat to the 5-year totals accompanying the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979.●

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. I am sorry to impose on my colleagues, but I have good reason.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today, it stand in recess until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, rather than 9 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION TOMORROW OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON FINANCIAL AID TO NEW YORK CITY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tomorrow morning, after the two leaders have been recognized, the Senate proceed to the consideration of the conference report on financial aid to New York City, which can be called up without unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDERS FOR CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES ON TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of the conference report tomorrow, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 776, the health planning bill, on which there is a time agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of that bill, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 720, the Bureau of Land Management authorization, on which there is a time agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate disposes of that bill, it proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 741, the Federal reclamation dam bill, on which there is a time agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is there a time agreement on amendments on the last item?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes.

Mr. DOMENICI. How much time on the amendments?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Thirty minutes.

Mr. DOMENICI. I thank the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that upon the disposition of that bill, the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 640, the International Monetary Fund bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VITIATION OF ORDER FOR CONVENING ON SATURDAY; ORDER FOR RECESS FROM FRIDAY UNTIL MONDAY NEXT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the convening of the Senate on Saturday, at 9 a.m., be vitiated; and that when the Senate completes its business on Friday, it stand in recess until the convening time already ordered for Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I will not object—I only observe that on the list that the majority leader has gone through, and on which we have conferred, the last two items, Nos. 4 and 5, have been reversed, so that Calendar No. 741, the dams bill, will be the fourth item, and Calendar No. 640 will be the fifth item, which is at variance with the way in which I conferred with Members on this side.

There is no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank all Senators for their consideration and patience.

This means that we will have votes tomorrow, we will have votes Friday, and there will be no session Saturday.

I ask unanimous consent that there be no rollcall votes on Monday prior to 3 p.m., with one exception, that being rollcall votes that may be necessary to secure a quorum of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank all Senators.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of S. 3075.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there a sufficient second? There is a sufficient second.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question is, Shall it pass? On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk called the roll.

Mr. CRANSTON. I announce that the Senator from South Dakota (Mr. ABOUREZK), the Senator from Alabama (Mrs. ALLEN), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND), the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN), the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. STENNIS), the Senator from Hawaii (Mr. INOUYE), and the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES) are necessarily absent.

I further announce that, if present and voting, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY), the Senator from Minnesota (Mr. ANDERSON), and the Senator from Alabama (Mr. SPARKMAN) would each vote "yea."

Mr. STEVENS. I announce that the Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. BROOKE), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. GOLDWATER), the Senator from Kansas (Mr. PEARSON), the Senator from Virginia (Mr. SCOTT), and the Senator from North Dakota (Mr. YOUNG) are necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 73, nays 13, as follows:

So the bill (S. 3075), as amended, was passed, as follows:

S. 3075

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "International Security Assistance Act of 1978".

CONTINGENCY FUND

SEC. 2. Section 551(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "for the fiscal year 1978 not to exceed $5,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "for the fiscal year 1979 not to exceed $2,500,000".

DRUG ENFORCEMENT AGENCY OVERSEAS ACTIVITIES

SEC. 3. Section 481(c)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(c)(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no such officer or employee of the United States may engage or participate in any direct police arrest action in any foreign country with respect to narcotics control efforts. No such officer or employee of the United States may interrogate or be present during the interrogation of any United States person without the written consent of such person arrested in any foreign country with respect to narcotics control efforts. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to the activities of the United States Armed Forces in carrying out their responsibilities under applicable Status of Forces arrangements."

INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS CONTROL

SEC. 4. (a) Section 482 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "$39,000,000 for the fiscal year 1978", and inserting in lieu thereof "$40,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979".

(b) Section 482 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Funds authorized under this section shall not be made available for the procurement of weapons or ammunition for the purposes of this section.".

HUMAN RIGHTS PROVISIONS

SEC. 5. (a) Section 502B(a)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Security assistance may not be provided to the police, domestic intelligence, or similar law enforcement forces of a country and export licenses for crime control and detection equipment may not be issued to a country the government of which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights unless the President in writing certifies that exceptional circumstances exist warranting provision of such assistance.".

(b) Section 502B(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(4) No assistance under chapter 5 of part II of this Act may be provided to a country the government of which engages in a consistent pattern of gross violations of internationally recognized human rights unless the President certifies in writing to the appropriate committees of Congress that extraordinary circumstances exist warranting provision of such assistance.".

MILITARY ASSISTANCE

SEC. 6. (a) Section 504(a)(1) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"(a)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out the purposes of this chapter not to exceed $133,500,000 for the fiscal year 1979. Not more than the following amounts of funds available to carry out this chapter may be allocated and made available for assistance to each of the following countries for the fiscal year 1979:

| "Country: | Amount |
|---|---|
| Portugal | $27,900,000 |
| Spain | 41,000,000 |
| Jordan | 45,000,000 |
| Philippines | 18,100,000 |

The amount specified in this paragraph for military assistance to any such country for the fiscal year 1979 may be increased by not more than 10 per centum of such amount if the President deems such increase necessary for the purposes of this chapter.".

(b) Section 516(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, is amended by inserting immediately before the period at the end thereof a comma and "until September 30, 1981, to the extent necessary to carry out obligations incurred under this chapter with respect to Greece, Indonesia, and Thailand between October 1, 1977, and September 30, 1978".

STOCKPILING OF DEFENSE ARTICLES FOR FOREIGN COUNTRIES

SEC. 7. Section 514(b)(2) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by striking out "$270,000,000 for the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "$90,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979".

INTERNATIONAL MILITARY ASSISTANCE AND SALES PROGRAM MANAGEMENT

SEC. 8. Section 515 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended:

(1) in subsection (a) by adding the following sentence after the first sentence: "It is the sense of Congress that its authorization of military assistance advisory groups to any country under subsection (b)(1) is contingent upon the submission by the Executive Branch of sufficient justification that continuation of such group(s) is essential to United States foreign policy or national security interest.";

(2) in subsection (b)(1)—

(A) by striking out "the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "the fiscal year 1979"; and

(B) by striking out "Brazil" and inserting in lieu thereof "Greece, Turkey, Indonesia, Thailand";

(3) by adding the following sentence at the end of subsection (b)(3): "Such personnel serving on a reimbursable basis shall be counted as part of the ceiling for the purposes of subsection (d).";

(4) in subsection (d)—(A) by deleting "865" and inserting in lieu thereof "775"; and (B) by striking out "the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "the fiscal year 1979";

(5) in subsection (f), by striking out "1976" and inserting in lieu thereof "1977";

(6) In subsection (g) by inserting "for fixed" before "periods of time"; and

(7) Adding at the end thereof the following:

"(h) The President shall continue to instruct United States diplomatic and military personnel in United States missions abroad that their actions should not be intended to encourage, promote or influence foreign countries to purchase United States-made military equipment, unless such personnel are specifically instructed to do so by appropriate authorities of the executive branch.".

ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUND

SEC. 9. (a) Chapter 4 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to read as follows:

"CHAPTER 4—ECONOMIC SUPPORT FUND

"SEC. 531. AUTHORITY.—(a)(1) The Congress recognizes that under special economic, political, or security conditions the national interests of the United States may require support for countries or in amounts which could not be justified solely under chapter 1 of Part I of this Act. In such cases, the President is authorized to furnish assistance to countries and organizations, on such terms and conditions as he may determine, in order to promote economic or political stability. In planning assistance intended for economic development under this chapter, the President shall take into account, to the maximum extent feasible, the policy directions of section 102.

"(2) The Secretary of State shall be responsible for policy decisions and justifications for economic support programs under this chapter, including determinations of whether there will be an economic support program for a country and the amount of the program for each country. The Secretary shall exercise this responsibility in cooperation with the Administrator of the agency primarily responsible for administering this part.

"(b)(1) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out the purposes of this chapter for the fiscal year 1979, $1,932,000,000. Of the funds authorized to be appropriated for assistance to the countries of southern Africa $10,000,000 shall be earmarked for humanitarian assistance to the people of Rhodesia and $10,000,000 shall be earmarked for the establishment of support for educational and vocational training programs for Rhodesia.

"(2) Amounts appropriated to carry out this chapter are authorized to remain available until expended.

"(c) Amounts appropriated to carry out this chapter shall be available for economic programs only and may not be used for military or paramilitary purposes.

"(d) No assistance may be furnished under this section to Mozambique, Angola, Tanzania, or Zambia, except that the President may waive this prohibition with respect to any such country if he determines (and so reports to the Congress) that furnishing such assistance to that country would further the foreign policy interests of the United States.

"SEC. 532. MIDDLE EAST PROGRAM.—(a) The Congress recognizes that a peaceful and lasting resolution of the divisive issues that have contributed to tension and conflict between countries in the Middle East is essential to the security of the United States and the cause of world peace. The Congress declares and finds that the United States can and should play a constructive role in securing a just and durable peace in the Middle East by facilitating increased understanding between the Arab countries and Israel and by assisting the nations in the region in their efforts to achieve economic progress and political stability, which are the essential foundations for peace. It is the sense of Congress that the United States assistance programs in the Middle East should be designed to promote mutual respect and security among the countries in the area and to foster a climate conducive to increased economic development, thereby contributing to a community of free, secure, and prospering countries in the Middle East.

"(b)(1) Of the amounts authorized to be appropriated to carry out this chapter for the fiscal year 1979, not less than $785,000,000 shall be available only for Israel, not less than $750,000,000 shall be available only for Egypt, and not less than $93,000,000 shall be available only for Jordan.

"(2) Of the amounts earmarked for Israel, the total amount may be made available as a cash transfer: Provided, That the President shall ensure that the level of cash grants does not cause an adverse impact on the total amount of United States nonmilitary exports to Israel.

"(3) Not less than 67 percent of the assistance furnished to Israel and Egypt under this chapter for the fiscal year 1979 shall be provided on a grant basis.

"(4) The President is requested to provide that at least $65,000,000 of the funds authorized under this chapter for Egypt shall be made available for the development and encouragement of private enterprise in Egypt. Programs authorized under this paragraph shall be developed in close consultation with the Overseas Private Investment Corporation. It is the intent of Congress that these funds, to the maximum extent feasible, should be used to encourage other donors, especially the Arab countries that are members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, to participate in private enterprise development in Egypt. Funds made available under this subsection may be used, inter alia, for lending to Egyptian private business enterprise, to provide necessary surveys, services, and programs to encourage and support private enterprise development, and to contract for personnel to assist such programs.

"(5) It is the sense of Congress that programs which stress regional development or regional scientific and technical cooperation between Israel and its Arab neighbors can contribute in an important way for the mutual understanding that must serve as the basis for permanent peace in the Middle East. Of the amount authorized to be appropriated to carry out this chapter for the fiscal year 1979, not less than $25,000,000 shall be available only to fund regional programs which stress development or scientific and technical cooperation between Israel and its Arab neighbors or programs which would be used for Arab-Israeli cooperation once normalization of relations between Israel and the Arab nation occurs.

"(6) (A) Funds appropriated to carry out this chapter for the fiscal year 1979 may not be expended for construction of the proposed potash production facility in Jordan until the President has determined (and has reported his determination to the Congress) that Jordan has obtained firm commitments from other sources for the financing which will be required for that project in addition to the proposed United States contribution.

"(B) Funds appropriated to carry out this chapter for the fiscal year 1979 may not be expended for construction of the proposed Maquarin Dam and Jordan Valley Irrigation System until the President has determined (and has reported his determination to the Congress) that Jordan has obtained firm commitments from other sources for the financing which will be required for that project in addition to the proposed United States contribution.

"SEC. 533. SOUTHERN AFRICA PROGRAM.—Of the amount authorized to be appropriated to carry out this chapter for the fiscal year 1979, $70,000,000 shall be available only for the countries of southern Africa to address the problems caused by the economic dislocation resulting from the conflict in that region and for education and job training assistance. Such funds may be used to provide humanitarian assistance to African refugees and persons displaced by war and internal strife in southern Africa, to improve transportation links interrupted or jeopardized by regional political conflicts, and to provide economic support to countries in the region, except that none of the funds under this section may be available for other than the purposes specified in this section.

"(b) Section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 is amended—

"'(1) by striking out the second and third sentences of subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: no Executive order which was issued under this subsection before the date of enactment of the Foreign Assistance Authorization Act, fiscal year 1979 and which applied measures against Rhodesia pursuant to any resolution of the United Nations Security Council may be enforceable before the beginning of fiscal year 1980: Provided, That the President of the United States determines that: (a) the Government of Rhodesia has committed itself to participate in, and negotiate in good faith, at an all-parties conference held under international auspices on all relevant issues, including the terms of majority rule and the protection of minority rights, the Anglo-American plan and the terms of the Salisbury Agreement, and (b) a government has been installed, chosen by free elections in which all population groups have been allowed to participate freely, with observation by impartial internationally recognized observers.

"'(2) by striking out subsections (b) and (c).'.

"SEC. 534. TURKEY AND CYPRUS PROGRAMS.—(a) It is the sense of Congress that the continuing dispute involving Cyprus is a major threat to the long-term stability of the southern flank of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. The Congress, therefore, urges all parties to that dispute to recognize that an expeditious and just settlement of their differences is in the best interest of all parties concerned. The Congress further recognizes that continuation of the reconstruction efforts on Cyprus and measures to stabilize the Turkish economy can contribute to a just and lasting settlement to the Cyprus dispute.

"(b) Of the funds authorized to be appropriated in this chapter, not less than $15,000,000 shall be available only for refugee relief and reconstruction on Cyprus.

"(c) Of the funds authorized to be appropriated in this chapter not less than $50,000,000 shall be available only for Turkey.".

(b) (1) Part VI of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is repealed.

(2) Section 115 of such Act is amended by striking out "(security supporting assistance or) under part VI (assistance for Middle East Peace)" and by inserting in lieu thereof "(economic support fund)".

(3) Section 502(B)(d)(2)(A) of such Act is amended—

(A) by striking out "(security supporting assistance)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(economic support fund)"; and

(B) by striking out "or part VI (assistance to the Middle East)".

(4) Section 669(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "security supporting assistance" and inserting in lieu thereof "economic support fund assistance";

(5) Section 670(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "security supporting assistance" and inserting in lieu thereof "economic support fund assistance"; and

(6) Section 653 of such Act is amended by striking out "security supporting assistance" each place it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "economic support funds".

INTERNATIONAL MILITARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING

SEC. 10. Section 542 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by—

(1) striking out "$31,000,000 for the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "$31,800,000 for the fiscal year 1979"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following: "None of the funds authorized to be appropriated under this section may be used to train military officers or civilian personnel from Nicaragua or Paraguay.".

INTERNATIONAL MILITARY EDUCATION AND TRAINING AND HUMAN RIGHTS

SEC. 11. Section 543 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of the first paragraph;

(2) by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (2) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and "and"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(3) to increase the awareness of nationals of foreign countries participating in such activities of basic issues involving internationally recognized human rights.".

SEC. 12. Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"CHAPTER 6.—INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING, BASE RIGHTS, AND RELATED PROGRAMS

"SEC. 551. INTERNATIONAL PEACEKEEPING.—(a) The Congress finds that under special circumstances the introduction of United Nations Forces or other peacekeeping personnel into a region can provide a great measure of stability in a region and thus promote the cause of world peace.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated $8,700,000 in the fiscal year 1979 to help support United Nations Forces in Cyprus.

"(c) There are authorized to be appropriated $11,700,000 in the fiscal year 1979 for the Sinai Support Mission.

"SEC. 552. BASE RIGHTS POLICY STATEMENT AND AUTHORIZATION.—(a) It is the sense of Congress that in general multiyear authorizations of foreign assistance should not be used to obtain agreements on base rights.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated $7,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for Spain to carry on programs of nonmilitary cooperation with the United States in the fields of education, culture, science and technology, pursuant to the Treaty of Friendship of Cooperation between the United States and Spain, signed at Madrid on January 24, 1976.

"SEC. 553. SPECIAL REQUIREMENTS FUND.—(a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the President $5,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979 for special requirements related to international peacekeeping in the Middle East. Such funds are authorized to remain available until expended.

"(b) The President may not obligate or expend, for any foreign country or international organization, funds authorized under this section—

"(1) unless he has reported to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the Chairmen of the Committee on Foreign Relations and the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate concerning—

"(A) the name of such foreign country or international organization;

"(B) the amount of such funds to be made available to each such country or organization;

"(C) the purpose for which such funds are to be made available to such country or organization; and

"(D) the reasons why it is in the national interest to use funds appropriated under this section for such purpose rather than—

"(i) using other available funds; or

"(ii) if no funds are available for such purpose, awaiting the enactment of legislation making funds specifically available for such purpose; and

"(2) if the Congress, within thirty calendar days after receiving any report under paragraph (1), adopts a concurrent resolution stating in substance that it does not approve the provisions of the report required by paragraph (1).".

SEC. 13. Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended by section 12 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"CHAPTER 7—ARMS TRANSFER AUTHORIZATION FOR THE REPUBLIC OF KOREA

"SEC. 561. ARMS TRANSFER.—(a)(1) The President is authorized, until December 31, 1982—

"(A) to transfer to the Republic of Korea, without reimbursement, such United States Government-owned defense articles as he may determine which are located in Korea in the custody of units of the United States Army scheduled to depart from Korea; and

"(B) to furnish to the Republic of Korea, without reimbursement defense services (including technical and operational training) in Korea directly related to the United States Government-owned defense articles transferred to the Republic of Korea under this subsection.

"(2) Any transfer under the authority of this section shall be made in accordance with all the terms and conditions of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 applicable to the furnishing of defense articles and defense services under chapter 2 of part II of that Act, except that no funds heretofore or hereafter appropriated under the Act shall be available to reimburse any agency of the United States Government for any such transfer or related services.

"(b) In order that transfers of defense articles under subsection (a) will not cause significant adverse impact on the readiness of the Armed Forces of the United States, the President is authorized, in lieu of such transfers to transfer additional defense articles from the stocks of the Department of Defense, wherever located, to the Republic of Korea to compensate for the military capability of defense articles withdrawn from Korea in any case where he determines that—

"(1) the transfer of specific defense articles located in Korea would have a significant adverse impact on the readiness of the United States Armed Forces;

"(2) the defense capability provided by those defense articles is needed by the Armed Forces of the Republic of Korea in order to maintain the military balance on the Korean peninsula; and

"(3) a comparable defense capability could be provided by less advanced defense articles in the stocks of the Department of Defense which could be transferred without significant adverse impact on the readiness of the United States Armed Forces.

The President shall report to the Congress each determination made under this subsection prior to the transfer of the defense articles described in such determination.

"(c) The President shall transmit to the Congress, together with the presentation materials for security assistance programs proposed for each fiscal year through and including the fiscal year 1983, a report describing the types, quantities, and value of defense articles furnished or intended to be furnished to the Republic of Korea under this section.

"(d) The President shall also transmit to the Congress a report on the viability of troop withdrawal one hundred and twenty days prior to each phase of the withdrawal. This report shall include assessments of the military balance on the peninsula, the impact of withdrawal on the military balance, the adequacy of United States military assistance, the impact of withdrawal on the United Nations and the Republic of Korea command structure, Republic of Korea defensive fortifications and defense industry developments, the United States reinforcement capability, and the progress of diplomatic efforts to reduce tensions in the area.".

TURKEY ARMS EMBARGO

"SEC. 14. (a) Section 620(x) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is repealed.

(b) The Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended by inserting, after section 620B, the following new section:

"SEC. 620C. UNITED STATES POLICY AND PROCEDURE REGARDING CYPRUS, GREECE AND TURKEY.—(a) Congress finds that—

"(1) events in Cyprus in 1974, precipitated by a coup sponsored by the Greek military dictatorship and resulting in an intervention by Turkish military forces, created an international problem within the authority and responsibility of the United Nations;

"(2) given the presence in Cyprus of a United Nations peace-keeping force mandated to prevent further inter-communal violence, and given the inter-communal negotiating process established under the aegis of the United Nations Secretary General, the continuing presence of a major Turkish force is inconsistent with the legitimate status of Cyprus as a sovereign republic;

"(3) United State policy respecting this problem should continue to accord high priority to supporting the implementation of United Nations resolutions regarding Cyprus and United Nations efforts to restore full Cypriot sovereignty through the negotiation of a just settlement;

"(4) United States limitations on arms transfers to Turkey enacted in 1975 represented a strong American desire to support such efforts and to affirm basic U.S. foreign assistance statutes;

"(5) although events in Cyprus have caused bitterness among the people of Cyprus, Turkey, and Greece, the United States continues to have a strong interest in maintaining stable and sound relations with each of these nations;

"(6) the maintenance of such positive relations will inevitably depend on the achievement of a just-solution on Cyprus.

"(b) Regarding such solution, Congress finds that—

"(1) the guidelines for inter-communal talks agreed to in Nicosia in February 1977—setting for the common goal of an independent, sovereign, nonaligned, bicommunal Federal Republic of Cyprus—continue to provide a sound basis for the negotiation of a just settlement in that nation;

"(2) serious negotiations, under United Nations auspices, will be necessary to achieve detailed agreement on, and implementation of, constitutional and territorial terms within such guidelines;

(3) the United States should actively support efforts to achieve such a just solution, providing full protection for the human rights of all Cypriots.

(c) United States policy regarding Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey shall be directed toward the restoration of a stable and peaceful atmosphere in the Eastern Mediterranean region and shall therefore be governed by the following principles:

"(1) the United States shall actively support the resolution of differences through internationally established peaceful procedures, shall encourage all parties to avoid provocative actions, and shall strongly oppose any attempt to resolve disputes through force or threat of force;

"(2) United States arms transfers to Greece and Turkey shall be made solely for defensive purposes and to sustain their strength as North Atlantic Treaty Organization allies, shall be designed to insure that the present balance of military strength among countries in the region is preserved, and shall not signify a lessening of the United States commitment to a just solution on Cyprus;

"(3) the achievement of such a solution shall remain a central concern of United States policy in the region; and

"(4) because future United States relations with the nations concerned must be shaped according to progress toward such a solution, the President and Congress shall continually review such progress and shall determine United States policy in the region, including United States economic and military assistance, accordingly.

"(d) To facilitate such review, the President shall, within 60 days after the enactment of this section and at the end of each succeeding 60-day period, transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, a report on progress made during such period toward the conclusion of a negotiated solution of the Cyprus problem. Such transmissions shall include any relevant reports prepared by the Secretary General of the United Nations for the Security Council.

"(e) Upon enactment of this Act, the President shall, with any request for funds for military or economic assistance under this Act, or credits or guaranties under the Arms Export Control Act, for countries named in this section, transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate his certification (with a full explanation thereof) that the goals set forth in this section have been substantially achieved or that such assistance would contribute to their achievement. Such certification shall also accompany any notification of anticipated arms sales to such countries submitted for Congressional consideration under the provisions of section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act."

(c) Notwithstanding section 37 of this Act, subsections (a) and (b) of this section shall take effect upon the date of its enactment.

ARMS SALE PRINCIPLES

SEC. 15. Chapter 1 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 6. ARMS SALE PRINCIPLES.—(a) It is the sense of Congress that specific principles set forth in legislation will assist both the executive branch and the Congress in their stated desire to control the sale of arms from the United States to foreign countries and organizations. The executive branch is directed to consider the principles listed below while making an arms sale decision to any country except Japan, Australia, New Zealand, and those countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization The principles, however, are not intended to conflict with existing treaty obligations or with our historic interest in the security o. the State of Israel.

"The principles that are to be used as a standard of judgment are as follows:

"(1) Arms sales should be approved only if they clearly and demonstrably enhance United States national security interests and are consistent with United States foreign policy interests. Arms sales should be used only as an exceptional foreign policy implement. In determining the national security impact of an arms sale, account should be taken of the impact of the sale on United States defense readiness; and the sale of advanced weapons should not be approved unless the weapons system is operationally deployed by United States forces.

"(2) Arms sales should not substitute for diplomacy in bringing stability to areas experiencing regional strife. No arms sale should be approved for a region if such arms are likely to disrupt ongoing diplomatic efforts to achieve regional stability.

"(3) The United States should not be the first supplier to introduce into a region newly developed, advanced weapons systems which would create a new or significantly higher combat capability.

"(4) The sale of advanced weapons should not be approved if less advanced existing weapons systems are available which have roughly comparable capabilities. In addition, development of advanced weapons systems solely for export should not be permitted unless such systems can substitute for a more advanced system.

"(5) In general, weapons systems should be sold only if they can be utilized effectively by indigenous forces without large and long-term commitments of United States personnel in training, advisory, or maintenance capacities.

"(6) If a weapons system being considered for sale includes highly sophisticated technology which could damage United States national security interests when acquired by unfriendly states, the sale should be approved only after special arrangements are made to guard against espionage, theft of equipment, and defection of key personnel. Similar precautions should be taken for weapons that are especially useful to international terrorists.

"(7) Coproduction agreements for significant weapons, equipment, and major components should be approved only if the coproduced items are solely for the coproducer's own security requirements.

"(8) The sale of expensive weapons systems or related services should not be approved for less-developed countries if the impact of such sale would cause serious harm to such country's economic development prospects, unless such sales are vital for that country to deter a significant threat of external attack.

"(9) The human rights situation in recipient countries should be taken into account in all arms sales decisions.

"(10) Arms sales should not be approved simply because other arms suppliers might make the sale, unless it is determined that the sale of United States weapons is necessary for United States national security or foreign policy reasons.".

MULTILATERAL RESTRAINT

SEC. 16. Chapter 1 of the Arms Export Control Act, as amended by section 15 of this Act, is further amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. POLICY STATEMENT ON MULTILATERAL RESTRAINT.—(a) The Congress finds that—

"(1) worldwide control over arms transfers can be achieved only if other major arms suppliers cooperate in a multilateral effort to reduce arms exports; and

"(2) such other suppliers are more likely to cooperate to reduce the flow of arms to developing countries if the United States policy of restraint in arms exports is clearly evident.

"(b) It is the sense of the Congress that—

"(1) the President maintain adherence of the United States to a policy of restraint in arms exports;

"(2) the President increase participation of the United States in multilateral efforts to gain the cooperation of such other suppliers; and

"(3) the results of multilateral efforts to restrain arms exports should be taken into account in periodic evaluations of United States arms export policy.

"(c) Not later than December 31, 1979, the President shall prepare and transmit a detained report to the Congress—

"(1) assessing the results of the multilateral approach of the United States to arms export controls; and

"(2) commenting on the implications of these results for United States arms export policy.",

SALES FROM STOCK

SEC. 17. Section 21(e)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) by striking out in clause (B) "and" immediately after "defense articles";

(2) by adding "and" at the end of clause (C); and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(D) the recovery of ordinary inventory losses associated with the sale from stock of such defense articles that are being stored at the expense of the purchaser of such articles.".

RENEGOTIATION ACT OF 1951

SEC. 18. Section 22 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Contracts for the procurement of defense articles and defense services heretofore or hereafter entered into pursuant to this section or predecessor provisions of law shall be exempt from the provisions of the Renegotiation Act of 1951, as amended.".

ANNUAL ARMS TRANSFER PLAN

SEC. 19. Section 25 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 25. ANNUAL ESTIMATE AND JUSTIFICATION FOR SALES PROGRAM.—(a) The President shall transmit to the Congress, as part of the presentation materials for security assistance, programs proposed for countries other than the members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, Japan, Australia, and New Zealand for each fiscal year, a report which sets forth—

"(1) the estimated dollar value of all weapons and weapons related sales intended to be made to each such country under section 21 or 22 of this Act;

"(2) an estimate of the amount of all weapons and weapons related credits and guarantees requested for authorization to each such country under section 23 or 24 of this Act;

"(3) a detailed country by country list setting forth a best estimate of the identity and value of each weapons or weapons related major defense equipment sale, credit, or guarantee to be made to each such country under section 21, 22, 23, or 24 of this Act;

"(4) a detailed statement explaining the foreign policy and United States national security considerations involved in determining each country's sales credit, or guarantee level and weapons or weapons related major defense equipment list and how such sales would promote world peace;

"(5) a list of all findings which are in effect on the date of such transmission made by the President pursuant to section 3(a)(1) of this Act, together with a full and complete justification for each such finding;

"(6) an arms control impact statement for each purchasing country, including (A) an analysis of the relationship between expected sales, credits, or guarantees to each country and arms control efforts relating to that country, and (B) the impact of such expected sales, credits, or guarantees on the stability of the region that includes the recipient purchasing country; and

"(7) a best estimate of the number of United States Armed Forces and civilian personnel required to be stationed in each such country in connection with such sale, credit or guarantee for training or any other purpose.

"(b) Not later than thirty days following the receipt of a request made by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate or the Committee on International Relations of the Senate or the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives for additional information with respect to any estimate submitted pursuant to subsection (a), the President shall submit such information to such committee.

"(c) The President shall make every effort to submit all of the information required by this section wholly in unclassified form. In the event the President submits any such information in classified form, he shall submit such classified information in an addendum and shall also submit simultaneously a detailed summary, in unclassified form, of such classified information.

"(d) Any proposed sales which exceed the aggregate country total reported in section (a)(1) or which involves the sale of major defense equipment not identified in section (a)(3) may be made in compliance with section 36(b)(1) of this Act if the President determines that such sales are in the national security interests of the United States.

MILITARY SURVEYS

SEC. 20. Chapter 2 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"SEC. 26. FOREIGN MILITARY SURVEYS.—(a) The Congress finds that in the past military surveys prepared by the United States for foreign countries have had a significant impact on subsequent military procurement decisions of those countries. It is the policy of the United States that the results of military surveys conducted by the United States in no way represent a commitment by the United States to provide, any military equipment to any foreign country. Further, recommendations in such surveys should be consistent with the arms export control policy provided for in this Act.

"(b) As part of the quarterly report required under section 36(a) of this Act, the President shall include a list of all defense requirement surveys proposed for the following quarter.

"(c) The President shall, upon the request of the Chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee or the Chairman of the House International Relations Committee, provide the respective committee with a complete copy of any foreign military survey.".

FOREIGN MILITARY SALES AUTHORIZATION AND AGGREGATE CEILING

SEC. 21. Section 31 of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) in subsection (a), by striking out "$677,000,000 for the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "$677,800,000 for the fiscal year 1979";

(2) in subsection (b), by striking out "$2,102,350,000 for the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof $2,120,200,000 for the fiscal year 1979";

(3) in subsection (c), by striking out "the fiscal year 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "the fiscal year 1979"; and

(4) in subsection (d), by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$150,000,000".

FISCAL YEAR 1978 FOR LEBANON

SEC. 22. In addition to amounts otherwise authorized, there are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the President to carry out the Arms Export Control Act in the fiscal year 1978, not to exceed $5,000,000, to be available for obligation without regard to the limitations of section 31 (b) of such Act.

FULL DISCLOSURE REPORTS

SEC. 23. Section 26(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended—

(1) by amending clause (D) to read as follows:

"(D) an evaluation, prepared by the Director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency in consultation with the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Defense, of the manner, if any, by which such offer to sell will—

"(i) contribute to an arms race;
"(ii) increase the possibility of an outbreak or escalation of conflict;
"(iii) prejudice the negotiation of any arms controls: or
"(iv) adversely affect the arms control policy of the United States.";
(2) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (L);
(3) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon; and
(4) by adding at the end thereof the following:
"(N) the projected delivery dates of the defense articles to be offered;
"(O) a detailed description of weapons and levels of munitions that may be required as support for the proposed sale; and
"(P) an analysis of the relationship of the proposed sale to projected procurements of the same item.".

EXTENDED REVIEW PERIOD

SEC. 24. Section 36(b)(1) of the Arms Export Control Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "The period of thirty calendar days referred to in the preceding sentence shall be extended for an additional period of thirty calendar days if the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate or the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives, by two-thirds vote of the Members present, requests such an extension and the chairman of the respective committee so notifies the President before the date of expiration of such period of thirty calendar days. Not more than one such extension may be requested for the proposed issuance of any letter of offer.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 25. Not later than February 1 of each year the President shall transmit to the Congress an annual report, for the fiscal year ending prior to the fiscal year in which the report is transmitted, showing the aggregate dollar value and quantity of defense articles and defense services, and of military education and training, exported to each foreign country and international organization, by category, specifying whether the export was made by grant under chapter 2 or chapter 5 of part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, by sale under chapter 2 of the Arms Export Control Act, by commercial sale licensed under chapter 3 of that Act, or by other authority.

UNITED STATES-REPUBLIC OF CHINA MUTUAL DEFENSE TREATY

SEC. 26. (a) The Senate finds that—
(1) the continued security and stability of East Asia is a matter of major strategic interest to the United States;
(2) the United States and the Republic of China have for a period of twenty-four years been linked together by the Mutual Defense Treaty of 1954;
(3) the Republic of China has during that twenty-four-year period faithfully and continually carried out its duties and obligations under that treaty; and
(4) it is the responsibility of the Senate to give its advice and consent to treaties entered into by the United States.
(b) It is the sense of the Senate that there should be prior consultation between the Senate and the Executive Branch on any proposed policy changes affecting the continuation in force of the mutual defense treaty cited above.

INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1977 REVIEW REPORT

SEC. 27. The President shall, within 120 days of enactment of this Act, report in writing to the appropriate committees of Congress the results of the review conducted pursuant to section 27 of the International Security Assistance Act of 1977.

MARIJUANA, USE OF HERBICIDES TO ERADICATE

SEC. 28. Section 481 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 is amended to add a new subsection (d) which shall read:
"(d) The provisions of subsection (a) notwithstanding, no funds or assistance authorized in this Act shall be permitted to be used or shall be used, directly or indirectly, in connection with or to assist programs involving the spraying of herbicides to eradicate marijuana plants, if such herbicides are likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may use or consume the sprayed marijuana. The Secretary of State shall inform the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare of the use or intended use of any herbicide to eradicate marijuana by any country or international organization in a program receiving assistance under this Act. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, on the basis of scientific information and testing and after receiving comments from the Secretary of Agriculture and the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency, shall promptly advise the Secretary of State if such herbicide is likely to cause serious harm to the health of persons who may use or consume the marijuana sprayed with such herbicide. If the Secretary of State is so advised as to any herbicide, the herbicide shall be deemed inappropriate for use in such spraying programs and no funds or assistance otherwise authorized under this Act shall be provided for such programs. The Secretary of State shall submit a comprehensive report to the Congress by January 1 of each year explicitly detailing all efforts he has taken to ensure compliance with this provision and to prevent the spraying of marijuana with herbicides that may be harmful to human health.".

CLARIFY AUTHORITY TO CONTROL EXPORTS

SEC. 29. Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:
"(m)(1) With respect to any country engaged in activities which are detrimental to important political/military interests of the United States, any item which could have direct military application and could significantly assist such activities shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.
"(2) The Secretary of Commerce shall determine, in consultation with the Secretary of State, the types of transactions which shall be reviewed by the Secretary of State to carry out the purposes of this subsection. The Secretary of State shall have thirty calendar days to conduct the reviews referred to in this subsection and at the end of such period of time shall state his recommendation or his reasons for not making a recommendation.
"(3) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, or to Japan, Australia or New Zealand.
"(4) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply with respect to any agricultural commodity, including fats and oils or animal hides or skins.".

REVIEW OF UNITED STATES-SOVIET RELATIONS

SEC. 30. (a) The Congress finds and declares that a sound and stable relationship with the Soviet Union will help achieve the objectives of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act, strengthen the security of the United States, and improve the prospects for world peace.
(b) Therefore, it is the sense of the Congress that the President, in cooperation with the Congress and knowledgeable members of the public, should make a full review of United States policy towards the Soviet Union and report to the Congress. Such review should cover, but not be limited to—
(1) an over-all reevaluation of objectives and priorities of the United States in relations with the Soviet Union;
(2) the evolution of and sources of all bargaining power of the United States with the Soviet Union and how such bargaining power might be enhanced;
(3) what linkages do exist and should or should not exist between various elements of United States-Soviet relations such as arms control negotiations, human rights issues, and economic and cultural exchanges;
(4) the policies of the United States towards human rights conditions in the Soviet Union and how improved Soviet respect for human rights might be more effectively achieved;
(5) the current status of strategic arms limitations talks and whether such talks should be continued in their present framework or terminated and renewed in some other forum;
(6) the current status of other arms control negotiations between the United States and the Soviet Union;
(7) the challenges posed by Soviet and Cuban involvement in developing countries and a study of appropriate policy responses and instruments to meet such challenges more effectively;
(8) the impact of the relations of the United States with the People's Republic of China on relations with the Soviet Union;
(9) the impact of strategic parity on the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union and the ability of the United States to meet its obligations under the North Atlantic Treaty;
(10) the identification of economic, technological, scientific, and cultural relations with the Soviet Union and whether such relations are desirable and should be continued, expanded, restricted, or linked to other aspects of the relations of the United States and the Soviet Union;
(11) the evolution of Soviet domestic politics and the relationship between domestic politics and foreign policy behavior, especially towards the United States; and
(12) what improvements should be made in the institutions and procedures of United States foreign policy in order to insure a coherent and effective policy toward the Soviet Union.

NONIMMIGRANT VISAS

SEC. 31. Section 21 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State" is deleted.

CRIME CONTROL AND DETECTION INSTRUMENTS, CONTROL OF EXPORTS

SEC. 32. Section 4 of the Export Administration Act of 1969, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:
"(n)(1) Crime control and detection instruments and equipment shall be approved for export by the Secretary of Commerce only pursuant to a validated export license.
"(2) The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to countries which are members of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization or to Japan, Australia, or New Zealand.".

POLICY ON REPUBLIC OF KOREA

SEC. 33. It is the sense of the Congress that further withdrawal of ground forces of the United States from the Republic of Korea may seriously risk upsetting the military balance in that region and requires full advance consultation with the Congress. Prior to any further withdrawal the President should report to the Congress on the effect of any proposed withdrawal plan on preserving deterrence in Korea; the reaction anticipated from North Korea; a consideration of the effect of the plan on increasing incentives for South Korea to develop an independent nuclear deterrent; the effect of any withdrawal on our long-term military and economic partnership with Japan; the effect of any proposed withdrawal on the United States/Chinese and United States/Soviet military balance; and, the possible implications of any proposed withdrawal on the Soviet/Chinese military situation.

USE OF FOREIGN CURRENCY

SEC. 34. (a) Section 502(b) of the Mutual Security Act of 1954, as amended (22 U.S.C. 1754(b)), is amended to read as follows:

"(b)(1) Notwithstanding section 1415 of the Supplemental Appropriation Act, 1953, or any other provision of law, local currencies owned by the United States, which are in excess of the amounts reserved under section 612(a) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961, as amended, and of the requirements of the United States Government in payment of its obligations outside the United States, as such requirements may be determined from time to time by the President (and any other local currencies owned by the United States in amounts not to exceed the equivalent of $75 per day per person or the maximum per diem allowance for employees of the United States Government while traveling in a foreign country established under authority of subchapter I of chapter 57 of title 5, United States Code, whichever is greater, exclusive of the actual cost of transportation), shall be made available to Members and employees of the Congress for their local currency expenses when authorized by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Majority Leader of the Senate, the Minority Leader of the Senate, or the chairman of any committee of the House of Representatives or the Senate or of any joint committee of the Congress. Whenever local currencies owned by the United States are not otherwise available for purposes of this subsection, the Secretary of the Treasury shall purchase such local currencies as may be necessary for such purposes, using any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

"(2) Within the first sixty days that the Congress is in session in each calendar year, the chairman of each committee of the House of Representatives and the Senate and of each joint committee of the Congress shall prepare a consolidated report itemizing the amounts and dollar equivalent values of each foreign currency expended and the amounts of dollar expenditures from appropriated funds in connection with travel outside the United States, together with the purposes of the expenditures, including per diem (lodging and meals), transportation, and other purposes, and showing the total itemized expenditures during the preceding calendar year of such committee, and of each Member or employee of such committee, and shall forward such consolidated report to the Committee on House Administration of the House of Representatives (if the committee is a committee of the House of Representatives or a joint committee whose funds are disbursed by the Clerk of the House) or to the Secretary of the Senate (if the committee is a committee of the Senate or a joint committee whose funds are disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate). Each such consolidated report shall be open to public inspection and shall be published in the Congressional Record within ten legislative days after it is forwarded pursuant to this paragraph. In the case of the Select Committee on Intelligence of the Senate and the Permanent Select Committee on Intelligence of the House of Representatives, such consolidated report may, in the discretion of the chairman of such committee, omit such information as would identify the foreign countries in which Members and employees of such committees traveled.

"(3)(A) Each Member or employee who receives an authorization under paragraph (1) from the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the President of the Senate, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the Majority Leader of the Senate, or the Minority Leader of the Senate, shall, within thirty days after the completion of the travel involved, submit a report setting forth the information specified in paragraph (2), to the extent applicable, to the Clerk of the House of Representatives (in the case of a Member of the House or an employee whose salary is disbursed by the Clerk of the House) or the Secretary of the Senate (in the case of a Member of the Senate or an employee whose salary is disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate). In the case of an authorization for a group of Members or employees, such report shall be submitted for all Members of the group by its chairman, or if there is no designated chairman, by the ranking Member or, if the group does not include a Member, by the senior employee in the group.

"(B) Within the first sixty days that the Congress is in session in each calendar year, the Clerk of the House of Representatives and the Secretary of the Senate shall prepare a consolidation of the reports received by them under this paragraph with respect to expenditures during the preceding calendar year by each Member and employee, or by each group, in the case of expenditures made on behalf of a group which are not allocable to individual members of the group. Each such consolidation shall be open to public inspection and shall be published in the Congressional Record within ten legislative days after its completion.".

(b) The amendment made by subsection (a) shall take effect on the date of enactment of this Act.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN ISREAL AND EGYPT

SEC. 35. (a) The Congress finds that:

(1) A lasting settlement of the Arab-Israel conflict is vital to United States national interests as well as to the interests of the states of the region; and

(2) Support for a strong and secure Israel and the maintenance for this purpose of Israel's effective defense capabilities as essential to peace remains a fundamental tenet of United States foreign policy; and

(3) Direct, face-to-face negotiations between Israel and Egypt without preconditions is an historic opening for peace, and the support of such negotiations by other moderate Arab states, can best promote a peace settlement based on mutual concessions and accommodation; and

(4) The establishment of secure, recognized and defensible borders between Israel and its neighbors will discourage hostilities; and

(5) Full, normalized relations between Israel and its Arab neighbors, including trade, travel, tourism, communications and diplomatic relations are vital for peace.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the Government of the United States should continue to promote direct negotiations between Israel and Egypt and to encourage other Arab states to enter into negotiations leading to peace treaties with Israel; and that the United States should be responsive to Israel's economic needs and defense requirements including the provision of additional advanced aircraft, to maintain Israel's defense capability which is essential to peace.

SECTION 5 (b) AND (c) OF THE UNITED NATIONS PARTICIPATION ACT OF 1945

SEC. 36. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, subsection (b) and (c) of section 5 of the United Nations Participation Act of 1945 shall remain in force.

EFFECTIVE DATES

SEC. 37. Except with respect to the amendments made by sections 14 and 34, amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Passed the Senate July 26 (legislative day, May 17), 1978.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 3075.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, security assistanace is an important element in U.S. foreign policy and the International Security Assistance Act is the guiding legislation for our security assistance policies and programs. The importance of this legislation has been reflected in the intensive debate in the Senate over the past 2 days.

I want to express appreciation to the Committee on Foreign Relations for its careful consideration of this bill and to the leadership of the committee—the chairman, Mr. SPARKMAN, and the ranking minority member, Mr. CASE—for their roles in management of the bill on the floor.

I also want to thank other members of the Committee on Foreign Relations for the contributions they have made. Many of the committee members as well as other Senators have taken a very active role in the debate.

I would particularly like to express my gratitude to those who worked with me on behalf of the amendment relating to lifting the Turkish embargo and U.S. policy toward Cyprus, Greece, and Turkey. I refer to the other cosponsors of the amendment, Senators MCGOVERN, BENTSEN, and CHAFEE, as well as Mr. SPARKMAN, who joined in sponsoring the amendment lifting the embargo.

At the same time I would pay special tribute to the distinguished Senator from Maryland, Mr. SARBANES, and the distinguished Senator from Missouri, Mr. EAGLETON, for their valiant efforts in opposition to lifting the embargo.

In the case of the debate concerning sanctions on Rhodesia, Mr. HELMS made a notable contribution by helping to focus Senate attention on this important matter. Additionally, Mr. CASE, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CHURCH, and Mr. CLARK from the Foreign Relations Committee should be commended for their efforts.

Other particularly valuable contributions to the Senate's consideration of this bill were made by Senators GLENN, NUNN, and PERCY on Korean policy, and, of course, by the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BAKER.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business and that Senators be allowed to speak up to 5 minutes each.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 10:17 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to H.R. 11877, an act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Peace Corps and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act.

At 11.24 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendment of the Senate to H.R. 2777, an act to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes; requests a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. REUSS, Mr. ST GERMAIN, Mr. ANNUNZIO, Mr. DERRICK, Ms. OAKAR, Mr. PATTERSON of California, Mr. STANTON, Mr. ROUSSELOT, and Mr. WYLIE were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

At 2:09 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House has passed the following bills and joint resolution in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 11823. An act to amend section 1331 (c) of title 10, United States Code, to allow certain otherwise ineligible reservists to become eligible for retired pay, and for other purposes;

H.R. 11889. An act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase from $100 to $200 the monthly rate of special pension payable to each person who has been awarded the Medal of Honor;

H.R. 11890. An act to amend title 38 of the United States Code to provide that the survivors of a veteran who was rated totally and permanently service-connected disabled for a period of at least 10 years would be entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation as though the veteran had died from a service-connected disability;

H.R. 12196. An act to provide for cost-of-living adjustments in the annuity of a retired Comptroller General, and for other purposes;

H.R. 12349. An act to provide for the Du-Noir Basin addition to the Washakie Wilderness; and

H.J. Res. 946. A joint resolution to designate October 7, 1978, as "National Guard Day."

At 3:51 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, announced that the House has passed the bill (S. 3084) to amend and extend certain Federal laws relating to housing, community, and neighborhood development and preservation, and related programs, and for other purposes, with an amendment; that the House insists upon its amendment and requests a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. REUSS, Mr. ASHLEY, Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania, Mr. ST GERMAIN, Mr. GONZALEZ, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland, Mr. AUCOIN, Mr. BLANCHARD, Mr. LUNDINE, Mr. BROWN of Michigan, Mr. STANTON, Mr. ROUSSELOT, and Mr. WYLIE were appointed managers of the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

At 7:54 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bill:

H.R. 11877. An act to authorize supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1978, and to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979, for the Peace Corps, and to make certain changes in the Peace Corps Act.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

H.R. 11823. An act to amend section 1331 (c) of title 10, United States Code, to allow certain otherwise ineligible reservists to become eligible for retired pay, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Armed Services.

H.R. 11889. An act to amend title 38, United States Code, to increase from $100 to $200 the monthly rate of special pension payable to each person who has been awarded the Medal of Honor; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 11890. An act to amend title 38 of the United States Code to provide that the survivors of a veteran who was rated totally and permanently service-connected disabled for a period of at least ten years would be entitled to dependency and indemnity compensation as though the veteran had died from a service-connected disability; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

H.R. 12196. An act to provide for cost-of-living adjustment in the annuity of a retired Comptroller General, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

H.R. 12349. An act to provide for the Du-Noir Basin addition to the Washakie Wilderness; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION HELD AT DESK

The following joint resolution was read twice by its title and held at the desk:

H.J. Res. 946. A joint resolution to designate October 7, 1978, as "National Guard Day."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. CULVER, from the Committee on Environment and Public Works, with amendments:

S. 3077. A bill to amend and extend the Export-Import Bank Act of 1945, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 95-1039).

By Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, without amendment:

S. Res. 527. An original resolution waiving section 303(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3279. Referred to the Committee on the Budget.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. HAYAKAWA:

S. 3344. A bill for the relief of Rolf Erik Tibblin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. NELSON:

S. 3345. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the tax treatment of small business investment companies electing to be taxed as regulated investment companies; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HART:

S. 3346. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to exempt full-time students serving as resident assistants and resident counselors in private nonprofit institutions of higher education from that act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 3347. A bill relating to the employment of cemetery superintendents and assistant superintendents by the American Battle Monuments Commission; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. NELSON:

S. 3345. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the tax treatment of small business investment companies electing to be taxed as regulated investment companies; to the Committee on Finance.

● Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to provide a "deficiency dividend" procedure for companies which invest in smaller businesses under the Small Business Investment Act of 1958.

ROLE OF SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT COMPANIES

There are several types of corporations which are created as investment vehicles for the purpose of investing in other businesses. Among the familiar examples are mutual funds, real estate investment trusts, and personal holding companies. Less familiar are the "Small Business Investment Companies" (SBIC's) which were created pursuant to 1958 congressional legislation for the purposes of providing risk or venture capital for investment in new and small businesses. SBIC's have since proven their worth by making 40,000 investments totaling $1.5 billion since they were authorized in 1958. They are one of the only sources of capital for many new, young, and growing small businesses which are not large enough to reach public securities markets. They are, thus, a source of strength, not only for the small businesses, but the entire economy.

All of these four types of corporations serve as a conduit for the collection and transmission of income to the ultimate shareholders.

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The law provides that as long as 90 percent of the income in any year is paid to the shareholders, the conduit company need not pay a corporate tax on the income realized at the corporate level. Of course, this income is fully taxable to the shareholders at their individual income tax rates. However, if the 90-percent figure is not reached by the investment company, the corporate tax is imposed upon the full income of the conduit, in addition to the tax on the individual shareholders. However, this harsh result can be avoided in the case of REIT's and personal holding companies, because existing law provides that if the 90-percent level is missed, these companies may later go back and pay a "deficiency dividend" to bring them up to the 90-percent level and, therefore, avoid the double taxation.

In fairness, this procedure ought to be extended to SBIC's.

This bill would accomplish a result for SBIC's which is similar to that already in the law for personal holding companies and REIT's.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

This bill was first introduced in the Senate in 1976 (amendment No. 2077 to H.R. 10612) in connection with consideration of the Tax Reform Act of 1976.

It was not considered on the floor at that time, because hearings had not been held on the measure, and there was the large number of pending floor amendments.

In 1978, the bill was reintroduced in the House as H.R. 6877. On June 14, 1978, it was the subject of testimony before the Subcommittee on Miscellaneous Revenue Measures, along with 10 other minor technical proposals.

The subcommittee has now marked-up this legislation and has reported it favorably to the full Ways and Means Committee.

It is significant that the Treasury Department has expressed support for the extension of the deficiency dividend principle to SBIC's and mutual funds. (Description of technical and minor bills listed for hearing before the Subcommittee on Miscellaneous Revenue Measures, June 14–15, 1978, Subcommittee Print, June 13, 1978 p. 9.)

WHAT THE BILL WOULD ACCOMPLISH

This bill will relieve a cloud of uncertainty which is inhibiting the formation of new SBIC's and the actions of the 32 existing small business investment companies having one-half of all the assets in the industry and which are subject to the Investment Act of 1940.

It is doing so, because of the fear that any company could be judged to be out of compliance with the 90-percent rule and, thus, subject to a large tax bill, even when it has intended in perfectly good faith to observe the 90-percent payout rule.

An example has, in fact, occurred with one of the leading publically held SBIC companies. This company happens to be the first SBIC licensed under the act. It was founded in 1959, and had never been cited by any Federal agency for any compliance problem.

How could such a shortfall occur? Recently the IRS, in a controversial administrative and technical decision, disallowed a loan loss reserve of the company in the amount of $37,552.86. A "loss reserve" is an amount deducted from income and set aside in case loans might fail. There has been a continuing controversy about what methods should be used to calculate the amount of such a reserve. In this instance, IRS insisted on its version of calculating the reserve. The Revenue Service also disallowed a profit-sharing plan deduction of $8,595. The result was that this SBIC missed paying out 90 percent of its income by the sum of $243.22.

As a consequence, IRS is now trying to collect corporate level taxes in the amount of $190,271.54. If this company were an REIT or personal holding company, it could declare a "deficiency dividend" and resolve the problem, according to its original intent to pay out at least 90 percent of its income. But under present law, no SBIC, no matter how well intentioned, has a legal right to do this.

This legislation would permit such a procedure in the future and also would apply to one company currently affected, as to which no question has been raised on the basis of the good faith of the company which is involved.

As a safeguard, the bill prohibits any such deduction if fraud is involved, with penalties prescribed which are comparable to those applying to real estate investment trusts under these circumstances.

SUMMARY

This bill would accord to SBIC's a relief provision which has already been enacted by Congress twice—for real estate investment trusts and personal holding companies. It is only equitable that the same procedure be available to the comparable type of investment company that exists to serve new and small businesses.

The proposal is acceptable to the Treasury Department and has been recently approved by a subcommittee of the House Ways and Means Committee without controversy.

I urge that the Senate act favorably upon this measure for the good of the small business investment industry and the small business community in general.●

By Mr. HART:

S. 3346. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to exempt full-time students serving as resident assistants and resident counselors in private nonprofit institutions of higher education from that act, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT AMENDMENT

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, the Department of Labor has determined that students serving as college dormitory counselors or resident advisors are "employees," to be paid in accordance with the minimum wage provisions set forth in the Federal Fair Labor Standards Act. Although some schools pay minimum wage, most award resident assistants with free room and board, academic credit, or a reduction in tuition. The position of many colleges is that resident assistants are primarily engaged in activities educational in nature and that the value received by these persons for their activities as resident assistants is more appropriately viewed through an analogy to athletic scholarships and grants-in-aid.

The Department of Labor intends to take legal action against schools not paying minimum wage to resident advisors in their dormitories, and will ask courts to require back-pay penalties. Legislation I am introducing today will eliminate the need for such lawsuits and resolve this situation by exempting full-time students serving as resident assistants from the minimum wage provisions of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

Although the resident assistant programs of many colleges are primarily for the benefit of outstanding students selected to serve as resident assistants, these programs also provide a means of liason between the school's administration and the residents in each resident hall. In addition they assist in fostering a living and learning climate which offers each student an opportunity to grow in a variety of directions while enjoying the values of an undergraduate college community.

The colleges and universities that are now, or shall soon become, involved in litigation with the Department of Labor, have no desire to violate the Fair Labor Standards Act or any other law. Their policy that the relationship between the school and the resident assistant is not an employment relationship, but is rather a fellowship award, is a just and logical one and should be upheld.

I hope Congress will act expeditiously in its consideration of this legislation. It provides a fair and equitable resolution to a problem confronting a large number of institutions of higher education. I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3346

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 3 (e) (1) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 is amended by striking out "paragraphs (2) and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "paragraphs (2), (3), and (4)".

(b) Section 3 (e) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(4) Such term does not include any individual certified by a private nonprofit institution of higher education to be a full-time student at that institution and employed by that institution as a resident assistant or resident counselor living in a resident hall or dormitory of such an institution.".●

By Mr. THURMOND (for himself and Mr. CRANSTON):

S. 3347. A bill relating to the employment of cemetery superintendents and assistant superintendents by the American Battle Monuments Commission; to the Committee on Veterans' Affairs.

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation which would require that personnel employed as superintendents and assistant superintendents of military cemeteries and memorials located on foreign soil be citizens of the United States. I am pleased to have joining me as cosponsors of this measure the distinguished chairman of the Senate Veterans' Affairs Committee, Senator CRANSTON.

These cemeteries and memorials are under the supervision of the American Battle Monuments Commission (ABMC) which was established by Congress in March of 1923. This Commission is responsible for the construction and permanent maintenance of all military cemeteries and memorials which are located outside the United States. The Commission also controls the design and provides regulations for the erection of monuments, markers, and memorials in these foreign countries by other U.S. citizens and organizations. When a visitor attends one of these cemeteries—often an American who has traveled thousands of miles to pay tribute to a fallen kinsman or friend—the superintendent will provide information concerning place of interment; best routes and modes of travel; and arranges for the placement of floral decorations at gravesites. Escort services within the cemetery plus other pertinent information are provided to the visitor by the superintendent and his staff.

Mr. President, there is currently a proposal before the Department of State that these cemeteries be turned over to the supervision of foreign nationals rather than being maintained by American personnel. I believe that such a proposal is most unwise and irresponsible.

American supervisors are essential to maintaining the beauty of the final resting place of the thousands of Americans who gave their lives for their country and are interred in or memoralized on foreign soil. These cemeteries are dear to the hearts of the relatives and friends of the dead and to numerous veterans' organizations.

By having these memorials and cemeteries maintained by American superintendents, we are demonstrating to not only concerned friends and relatives, but to all Americans and the world, that America does care for its fallen, and sometimes unknown, patriots.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3347

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the third paragraph of the first section of the Act entitled "An Act for the creation of an American Battle Monuments Commission to erect suitable memorials commemorating the services of the American soldier in Europe, and for other purposes", approved March 4, 1923 (36 U.S.C. 121), is amended by inserting immediately after the last sentence thereof the following new sentence: "Personnel employed as cemetery superintendents and assistant superintendents by the Commission shall be citizens of the United States.".●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

At the request of Mr. GOLDWATER, the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Concurrent Resolution 92, to see the resurrection of the Ukrainian Orthodox and Catholic Churches and other religions in the Ukraine.

AMENDMENT NO. 2176

At the request of Mr. DURKIN, the Senator from Minnesota (Mrs. HUMPHREY) and the Senator from Iowa (Mr. CLARK) were added as cosponsors of amendment No. 2176 intended to be proposed to S. 1500, a bill to designate certain lands in the State of Alaska as units of the National Park, National Wildlife Refuge, National Wild and Scenic Rivers, and National Wilderness Preservation Systems, and for other purposes.

SENATE RESOLUTION 527—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. CANNON, from the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 527

Resolved, that pursuant to Section 303(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of Section 303(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 3279, a bill to provide assistance to aircraft operators to aid them in complying with Federal aircraft noise standards, to amend the Airport and Airway Development Act of 1970 to provide assistance to airport operators and aircraft operators to aid them in complying with noise standards, and for other purposes.

Such waiver is necessary to permit consideration of new spending authority (as detailed below) to become effective in a fiscal year for which the first concurrent resolution on the budget has not been agreed to. Specifically, the new spending authority for which this waiver is needed arises from the authorization of additional funds from the Airport and Airway Trust Fund, as contained in Titles I and II of S. 3279, for a future fiscal year not yet considered by the Budget Committee. The total amount of the additional funding for fiscal year 1980, is $295 million.

Compliance under section 303(a) of the Budget Act was not possible because of the multiyear nature of airport development projects under the Airport and Airway Development Act. These projects are for airport development and construction that may take several years to complete and call for assurance that federal funding will be committed to that project in order to permit the airport operator to sell municipal bonds to raise the local authority's share of the project costs. This need for future commitment for planning purposes has been recognized by the Congress since the creation of the trust fund in 1970.

The entitlements contained in S. 3279 represent both renewals and extensions of existing spending programs under the Airport and Airway Development Act. The need for action on future year spending is clearly demonstrated by the increased appropriations for these programs contained in the Department of Transportation appropriations legislation for fiscal year 1979, which appropriated funds in excess of those authorized in the ADAP program for that fiscal year.

Because Congress anticipated possible modification and review of the ADAP program, the legal basis for expenditures of trust fund monies for discretionary programs expires at the end of fiscal year 1979, leaving no authority to spend discretionary funds in 1980. Yet the need for continued and increased discretionary funding for 1980 has been clearly demonstrated and is documented by a backlog of over $900 million in accumulated requests for ADAP funds of which over $600 million have been identified by the Federal Aviation Administration as high priority programs. Without the renewed and increased discretionary level for 1980, many airport safety programs will not be funded. The Airport and Airway Trust Fund, from which these needed projects are in major part sponsored, is currently running a surplus of nearly $2 billion which will not be significantly reduced by either the additional spending programs and authority contained in S. 3279 or by the proposed reductions in the ticket and freight weighbill taxes contemplated by S. 3279.

The comparable legislation pending before the House of Representatives contains substantially similar spending programs for fiscal year 1980 as are contained in the Senate bill, S. 3279. Yet the funding levels are higher than those contained in the Senate measure. The possibility therefore exists that the conference committee agreement will contain slightly higher figures than those contained in S. 3279. While this possibility exists, it should be noted that the Senate version incorporates a somewhat different approach than the House bill to solve the current funding crisis, which if accepted by the conference committee, will either reduce or eliminate the increases that might otherwise be expected in reaching a compromise on the two pieces of legislation.

Finally, as the Airport and Airway Development Act was created in 1970 and reviewed in 1976, it expires at the close of fiscal year 1980. The levels of authorization written in 1976 to run through 1980 could not have anticipated the dramatic growth in air traffic which has not only increased the pressures on airport development and construction but also created a significant surplus in the trust fund.

● Mr. CANNON. Mr. President, I am reporting on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation, a budget waiver resolution for S. 3279, the Aircraft and Airport Noise Reduction Act of 1978. The resolution requests a waiver from section 303 of the Budget Act to permit authorization of airport development funds for fiscal year 1980.●

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING

ELEMENTARY AND SECONDARY EDUCATION AMENDMENTS—S. 1753

AMENDMENTS NOS. 3307 THROUGH 3309

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mrs. HUMPHREY submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by her to S. 1753, a bill to extend the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965, and for other purposes.

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I wish to offer, for the consideration of the Senate, three amendments to S. 1753, a bill to extend the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965.

I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the fact that on July 13, the House of Representatives considered and passed a similar series of amendments, en bloc, to H.R. 15, the House version of the measure.

These amendments provide for broader language in both title IV, and the Special Projects Act to cover early childhood and family education programs.

I feel confident in speaking highly of these programs, because for several years, Minnesota has had very successful pilot/demonstration projects directed toward children who have not yet entered kindergarten, and are below age 6.

My amendments provide authority for special service components which provide educational and counseling services to parents of pre-school-age children. More specifically, they would identify potential barriers to learning, educate parents in child development, provide programs in child development, and support education programs on parenthood for students in secondary schools. The amendments would also make way for referral services, which enable these pilot programs to reach out and direct participants to other sources of Federal, State, and local funding, which might be of assistance. Public, private, and nonprofit agencies would be eligible to apply for program moneys.

These programs are based on the concept that learning begins at birth; and, that, while classroom instruction is important, early learning is crucial. They provide not only service, but also support to parents in educating their children.

These programs already have been established in Minnesota. The program activities include: discussion groups for parent, facilitated by an educator; programs for children, including supervised play and learning activities; coordination with libraries and other learning facilities outside the school, which provide materials that may be used in the home; and, programs for adolescents exploring that unique phase between childhood and parenthood. It must be pointed out that these efforts are non-duplicative of those that other agencies, such as Headstart or daycare perform. The projects are equally distributed to urban, suburban, and rural areas of the State; and, each program is geared to meet the specific needs and interests of its locality * * * perhaps this is the most important component of the project.

Support is particularly extended to the single, male, and working parent, with evening and Saturday sessions being provided, many times with the children in adjacent rooms under the supervision of an early childhood education teacher. This is not a nursery program; it is a socialization mechanism, and an opportunity for parents to see how the educator works with the child.

This activity has been well received in Minnesota, and I feel that it is time for Congress to implement programs of this nature throughout the country.●

FEDERAL PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION ACT OF 1978—S. 2441

AMENDMENT NO. 3310

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. HASKELL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 2441, the Federal Public Transportation Act of 1978.

● Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, today I am submitting an amendment to S. 2441, the Federal Public Transportation Act of 1978. This amendment acknowledges the substantial contributions public transportation can make toward reducing air pollution. Specifically, my amendment would direct the Department of Transportation, in consultation with the Environmental Protection Agency, to conduct a study to determine the feasibility of including the nature and extent of an area's air pollution as a criterion in the distribution of mass transit funds. In conducting the study, the Department of Transportation and the Environmental Protection Agency would be required to determine the most appropriate and reliable means of defining and measuring air pollution, to determine those mass transit programs which most easily and appropriately lend themselves to using air pollution as a factor, and to consider the relative weight which such an air pollution criterion should be given in devising any revised funding formula. The study additionally directs the Department of Transportation to identify any alternative approaches to modifying the criteria for allocating Federal mass transit funds which would assure full recognition of the vital role mass transit has to play in combating air pollution.

Mr. President, the Senate has frequently expressed its concern over the plight of our cities. Our cities are plagued with the problems of pollution and congestion, and the problems grow worse each day. The quality of life in our cities is deteriorating, they are no longer healthy places in which to live.

As a case in point, I would like to share with my colleagues the situation surrounding the capital city of my home State of Colorado.

Denver's air pollution problem is a complex one which does not lend itself to easy or simplistic solutions. Like most western and southern cities, Denver is a sprawl city. Its population density is comparatively low. Because the population is spread out over a larger area, the use of the private automobile becomes an attractive alternative, often the only alternative, much to the detriment of the environment. This situation is compounded by Denver's high altitude, for automobiles burn less efficiently in higher altitudes. This is the impasse that Denver faces, a land use pattern that encourages the use of the automobile which, because of high altitude, runs inefficiently, emitting lethal fumes into unusually thin air.

Mr. President, part of the rationale for funding and developing mass transit is to reduce reliance on the automobile and thereby make headway in ridding our urban areas of unhealthy air. The automobile is presently the major cause of air pollution, even in urban areas of heavy industrialization. According to the EPA, the amount of automobile related pollution is as high as 90 percent in some cities and accounts for at least 50 percent even in those areas with major sources of stationary pollution.

It is because of the automobile that 103 out of 105 urban areas—populations greater than 200,000—do not meet the National Ambient Air Quality Standards (NAAQS) for ozone, as mandated in the Clean Air Act and established by the EPA—only Honolulu, Hawaii, and Spokane, Wash. met the photochemical oxidant standard. These 103 urban areas, where over 100 million people reside, consistently experience oxidant levels above the NAAQS. In addition, 59 urban areas are now non-attainment areas with respect to the carbon monoxide NAAQS. Carbon monoxide is of course just as dangerous a health hazard as ozone. Mass transit programs which will reduce hydrocarbons, and therefore ozone levels, are imperative if we are to truly commit ourselves to resolving the problems of air pollution in our cities.

Currently, most public mass transit moneys are derived from two sources, section 3 discretionary programs and section 5 formula funding programs. Section 3 discretionary programs, which are under the Secretary's control, are provided to State and local agencies for bus purchases, rail modernization projects, and construction of new transit systems. In fiscal year 1977, these projects totaled $1,399,337,237. The other source of funding is the section 5 formula grant program. This section provides for Federal funds to assist in financing capital projects and operating expenses. Section 5 moneys are allocated according to a population/population density formula. In fiscal year 1977, these expenditures totaled $557,049,173.

S. 2441, the Federal Mass Transportation Act of 1978, makes a number of important changes in the way mass transit funds are distributed. This bill would simplify and consolidate the numerous funding categories into a more manageable number, while at the same time allowing for a greater degree of flexibility in the use of public transportation funds. It will provide for a more predictable funding mechanism for capital and operating expenses by transferring these costs out of the section 3 discretionary grant program into the section 5 formula grant program. Although population and population density would still play the major role in the distribution of section 5 formula moneys, factors such as the extent of commuter rail, fixed rail, and bus operating miles have also been included in the committee's bill. Additionally, this bill would create a comprehensive transportation planning program by consolidating the planning requirements for highway and transit programs. The House has recently passed a bill which also calls for major changes in the manner in which Federal mass transit funds are allocated.

I applaud the revisions made in the committee's bill as a necessary element of an effective transportation policy. However, none of these funding formulas—those in the bill reported by the committee, those in the House bill, or those in present law—directly take into account the significant contributions an effective mass transit system can make toward reducing urban air pollution. Mr. President, my amendment would provide the Congress with the factual information necessary to intelligently discuss this possibility.

Originally, it was my intention to devise a funding formula using air pollution as one factor in distributing funds, which could be adopted by the Congress this year. As I explored possible avenues to achieve this end, however, I became aware of a host of unanswered questions as to the most reliable, accurate air quality standards for such a purpose, the most reliable and standardized means of measuring air quality, and the relative weight which air pollution should be given in any revised funding formula. The study called for in my amendment will provide answers to these questions and lay the necessary groundwork for the Congress to devise a funding scheme which directly takes into account the role of mass transit in combating air pollution.

Mr. President, we can no longer afford to allow our cities to deteriorate. We, as a nation, must identify the causes and formulate the solutions to remedy this situation. The development of an effective mass transit system is one tool which must be utilized to curb the decline of the city. It is not the total answer, but it can and must play a part in the overall solution. My amendment will be the first step that will move us in that direction. My amendment is a sound and responsible approach to a problem that, if left unattended, will literally choke our cities. This amendment would create the necessary empirical foundation on which to address the growing problem of air pollution within the urban environment. It would allow us to intelligently explore the possible avenues that could lead to its correction. It is my hope that both bodies of Congress will recognize the severity of the problem and set our Government on a course to correct it. I invite my colleagues to join me in initiating this needed action.●

FAIR FUND TRANSFER ACT—S. 3156

AMENDMENT NO. 3311

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. GARN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, a bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems.

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I am today submitting an amendment to delete the $100 minimum civil penalty from section 918 of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act. This leaves intact the provision for the award of a civil penalty within the discretion of the court up to $1,000.

Where actual damages cannot be established in litigation under the bill, section 918 imposes a civil penalty in an amount of not less than $100 nor greater than $1,000 plus costs of the action and attorney's fees. The imposition of a $100 minimum civil penalty is objectionable because it has been a source of frivolous litigation under the Truth in Lending Act which has a similar provision. The problem with the minimum civil penalty is that it leaves the courts with very little discretion even though they find that a violation is technical and nonwillful. In such cases some courts have felt they must award a $100 civil penalty plus attorney's fees. Attorney's fees even in small cases can run into thousands of dollars.

The truth in lending experience under this minimal liability provision has been a horror story. Over 9,400 suits were filed under the Truth in Lending Act during fiscal years 1972 through 1977, and new suits are now being filed under it at a rate of over 2,000 per year in Federal district courts alone.

This litigation benefits no one other than the lawyers. The consumer receives a $100 award and the lawyers several thousand dollars in legal fees.

Because of the potential for abuse in this provision, Congress eliminated it from the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act. I urge that the same wise course be taken with regard to the Fair Fund Transfer Act.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT NO. 3311

On page 24, lines 6 and 7, after the word "action," strike out "an amount not less than $100 nor greater than" and insert in lieu thereof "such additional damages as the court may allow, but not exceeding".

On page 24, lines 9 through 11, strike out "(1) as to each member of the class no minimum recovery shall be applicable, and (ii)".●

AMENDMENT NO. 3312

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. GARN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to S. 3156, supra.

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I am submitting an amendment to section 917(c) of S. 3156, the Fair Fund Transfer Act, to exclude from the Federal Trade Commission's enforcement powers the right to enforce the provisions of the bill by using the authority granted under sections 18 and 19 of the recently amended Federal Trade Commission Act.

Section 18 of the FTC Act provides rulemaking procedure under which the Commission may promulgate and enforce trade regulation rules. Specifically, under it the Commission has the authority to seek civil penalties of up to $10,000 per violation without even notifying the alleged violator of the action in advance.

Section 19 of the FTC Act gives the Commission the authority to order many forms of consumer redress, such as restitution, contract reformation, and avoidance of parts or all of consumer contracts.

In view of the civil penalty provisions of this bill, particularly those which specifically sanction class action proceedings, the invocation of sections 18 and 19 of the FTC Act is not only unnecessary, it is unnecessarily harsh.

In legislation which provides its own civil penalties, each consumer is his or her own "private attorney general" with authority to enforce his or her own rights. Suits brought under those automatic civil penalty provisions (or the right to bring such suits) under the Truth in Lending Act have proved to be an important enforcement tool. More than 10,000 suits have been filed under the Truth in Lending Act in U.S. district courts alone, not including those filed in State courts and the use of truth in lending claims or defenses raised by way of set-off or counterclaim. The civil penalties provided in section 917 of this bill will have the same salutary effect so that enforcement under sections 18 and 19 of the Federal Trade Commission Act is unnecessary.

The amendment will also add the Civil Aeronautics Board and the Securities Exchange Commission as agencies to enforce the provisions of the bill with regard to airlines and stockbrokers who are beginning to issue debit cards to their customers.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the amendment was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMENDMENT 3312

On page 30, line 5, strike out "and".

On page 30, line 8, strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof "; and".

On page 30, between lines 8 and 9, insert the following:

"(4) the Federal Aviation Act of 1958, by the Civil Aeronautics Board with respect to any air carrier or foreign air carrier subject to that Act; and

"(5) the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, by the Securities and Exchange Commission with respect to any broker or dealer subject to that Act".

Beginning with page 30, line 19, strike out all through page 31, line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(c) Except to the extent that enforcement of the requirements imposed under this Act is specifically committed to some other Government agency under subsection (a), the Federal Trade Commission shall enforce such requirements. For the purpose of the exercise by the Federal Trade Commission of its functions and powers under the Federal Trade Commission Act, a violation of any requirement imposed under this Act shall be deemed a violation of a requirement imposed under that Act. All of the functions and powers of the Federal Trade Commission under the Federal Trade Commission Act (except sections 18 and 19) are available to the Commission to enforce compliance by any person with the requirements imposed under this Act, irrespective of whether that person is engaged in commerce or meets any other jurisdictional tests in the Federal Trade Commission Act".●

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

SUBCOMMITTEE ON MILITARY CONSTRUCTION AND STOCKPILES

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, during Senate floor action on the fiscal year 1979 military construction authorization bill, I announced my intention to hold early hearings to look into Defense Department policy on base realinements.

I have scheduled the opening session of these hearings to begin at 10 a.m., in room 212, Russell Building, on Thursday, August 3, 1978.

The purpose of these hearings is to look into policy questions. The hearings will not explore details of specific proposed realinement actions. This is a hearing on base realinement policy.

I know many of my colleagues are affected by the recently announced round of proposed base realinements and I extend an open invitation to any Senator who would like to participate in these hearings to do so.

Staff contact on this hearing is Mr. Jim Smith, 224–3871.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, the Subcommittee on the Constitution of the Committee on the Judiciary will hold 3 days of hearing, August 2, 3, and 4, 1978, on extending the deadline for the ratification of the equal rights amendment, Senate Joint Resolution 134. The hearings will commence at 9 a.m. and will be held in room 318, Russell Senate Office Building, on all 3 days.

Anyone wishing to submit testimony for the record, contact Mary Jolly, staff director of the Subcommittee on the Constitution, 102–B Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON HOUSING AND URBAN AFFAIRS

● Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, I should like to announce that the Subcommittee on Housing and Urban Affairs, of the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, will hold an oversight hearing, on Monday, August 7, 1978, on the problem of property insurance in urban America.

The hearing will begin at 10 a.m. and will be held in room 5302, Dirksen Senate Office Building.

The subcommittee would welcome statements for inclusion in the hearing record.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RHODESIA

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, the Richmond Times-Dispatch recently published an editorial about the perceptive observations made in this Chamber by the Senator from California, Senator HAYAKAWA, concerning his visit to Rhodesia. I ask that this editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

VOICE OF REASON

From May 25 to June 6, Sen. S. I. Hayakawa, R-Calif., visited South Africa, Rhodesia, Botswana, Zambia and Kenya in an effort to gain a perspective on the Rhodesian internal settlement between moderate blacks and whites. What he saw he reported to his Senate colleagues on June 28. It was a speech well worth listening to, because Mr. Hayakawa did gain some startling insights.

He saw the country being run by an Executive Council, with power shared equally by three blacks and former Prime Minister Ian Smith, who has frequently been stereotyped and castigated as a white racist.

He saw every ministry of government being occupied by two persons, one black and one white. He witnessed the co-ministers of foreign affairs, for example, working out their disagreements in an atmosphere of cooperation.

Perhaps most remarkably, he saw the leaders of the Patriotic Front organizations, the black nationalists who are trying to sabotage the internal agreement, walking the streets of Salisbury, Rhodesia's capital, without being bothered by government authorities.

Mr. Hayakawa said of the revolutionary leaders with whom he met: "We could invite them to breakfast in our hotel. No one said anything. They were not searched. They were not frisked by guards, not watched over. They had free access to any place they wanted to go in Salisbury."

Breakfasting with Albert Mugabe, the senator asked the whereabouts of his brother, Robert, the head of one of the PF grounds. The answer was that Robert Mugabe was in North Korea. (Mr. Hayakawa said he could only surmise that Mr. Mugabe was there taking an advance course in Marxism since he is on record as being a Marxist-Leninist who wants only one political party in Rhodesia/Zimbabwe—his own.)

Later, Mr. Hayakawa had supper at the same Salisbury hotel with Joshua Nkomo, the head of the other terrorist group in the PF. Again, the hotel staff asked no questions, save one: "Will you have white wine, sir, or red?"

The senator was struck by the difference in attitude between Mr. Nkomo and the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, one of the three blacks serving on the Executive Council, the transitional government that is supposed to lead to free, one-man-one-vote elections by the end of this year. Mr. Sithole, like Mr. Nkomo, had been imprisoned by the Ian Smith government in the past for "revolutionary" activities. But whereas Mr. Sithole had put the past behind him and was trying to make biracialism work, Mr. Nkomo and his associates continued to be consumed by bitterness over past injustices.

Mr. Hayakawa came away with the feeling that the United States government ought to be giving moral support to the whites and blacks who are trying to make interracial harmony and democracy function rather than giving comfort to those who are working from within—often through violence—to bring about one-party, one-race rule.

Toward that end, Mr. Hayakawa endorsed a proposal by Sen. Jesse Helms, R-N.C., to lift economic sanctions against Rhodesia so as to give the struggling interim government a better chance to survive the terrorist assaults and implement its plan for multiracial democracy. Sanctions could be reimposed, he pointed out, if Rhodesia reneged on its majority-rule promises.

Unfortunately, not enough senators were swayed by his appeal. The Senate passed by a 48–42 vote a motion by Sen. George McGovern, D-S.D., to table the Helms-Hayakawa move. We are pleased, however, that both of Virginia's senators, Harry F. Byrd Jr. and William L. Scott, were on the side favoring the lifting of sanctions. Senator Byrd praised Mr. Hayakawa's speech as "perhaps the most objective presentation on the situation in Rhodesia that I have heard in this chamber over a period of years."

Mr. Hayakawa spoke with the voice of reason. Maybe on another day, enough senators will heed that eloquent voice.●

RURAL AMERICA

● Mr. HASKELL. Mr. President, I have recently received from one of my constituents, Mr. Thorrel B. Fest of Boulder, Colo., a copy of an article by Glenn S. Pound of the University of Wisconsin, College of Agricultural and Life Sciences. Dean Pound briefly explains exactly what rural America and the agricultural community have added to the spirit of our great country. He then asks an extremely relevant question in light of the present cost-price crunch faced by American agriculture, "Is the farmer an endangered species?"

I highly recommend this article to each of my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

FARMER HAS BEEN DENIED HIS FAIR SHARE OF AFFLUENCE

Rural America gave us a great legacy. We should remember that:

Agriculture paced the economic development of America.

The family farm provided much of the cultural and economic greatness of our society.

a. It deployed people widely in terms of utilization of our resources as contrasted to our present intense urbanization.

b. It created a work ethic that became the hallmark of productivity and a prime characteristic in agriculture and industry alike.

Rural America provided a vast reservoir of morality and of political stability of our country, both of which we now have about lost.

Now, is this heritage lost? Is the farmer an endangered species?

The answer is yes. The farmer today is caught up in an economic situation in which surplus production weakens and erodes his market, but which provides no relief to him in his production expenses. Historically, during depressions commodity prices fell; unemployment increased with a resultant increase in personal services and a general deflation helped distribute equity in purchasing power.

This is not true now. The depression in farm products has not resulted in general deflation but rather inflation has continued unabated. Thus, the farmer is cast in a no-win role.

Compare the farmer's plight with that of the public utilities. Utility rates are highly regulated and public service commissions almost invariably grant price increases to permit a pass through of the costs to consumers. Consumers complain about utility increases, but ultimately, they pay them!

Consider the consumer and the automobile industry. Here, also, consumers are aghast at the high cost of new automobiles but they buy them in ever increasing numbers.

If consumers do not develop an acceptance of higher food costs, then the farmer is indeed an endangered species.

We have heard much about the level of parity appropriate for agricultural income. I think the parity formula is counterfeit for, by its definition, it implies that agriculture was equitably placed in our economic structure in the period 1910–1914.

I contend that the American society has never accorded agriculture a fair share of the affluence it has created. As a meaningful statistic in point, I cite that the average net income per farm in Wisconsin in 1973, the year of the exploding grain prices, was less than $7,500!

How many carpenters, plumbers, schoolteachers or bank employes have had so little income per family? One doesn't have to be very smart to see that there is something wrong with our economic system.

Why don't food prices come down in the presence of deflated farm prices? It is obvious that between the field and checkout counter there are add-on prices for other than raw product costs and that this sector of the food system uses the weakened product costs to relieve stress from other directions.

The farmer is not privileged to price out his own products. The market does this for him. Until he can establish on farm storage facilities that will give him some measure of control of marketing his products, he will always be at the mercy of the merciless system.

If America wants to preserve the family farm, then something has to happen where a family can make a living on the farm. The low income to the farming sector has been, in my judgment, perhaps the prime determinant of the structural changes in agriculture. The consumer is interested primarily in a dependable supply of good food at bargain prices. Our food supply, the dependability of supply, and our food quality are the best any nation has enjoyed in all of history.

In relation to the costs consumers pay for food at the supermarket, we generally do not factor in the costs of the taxpayer's support of agricultural research, government subsidy and price support programs, and so forth. So, in all fairness, we should admit that the grocery store costs do not represent the total food costs.

But how significant are these other costs in terms of payout and value received? They amount to only $5 per capita for each $1 billion of program costs. The industrialized countries of the Western world have a higher pay-out of food costs at the retail level than does America, but their governments also subsidize their food production system. So the comparatively cheaper food in the United States is real and significant.

Certain consumer groups frequently question, in relation to costs and a quality diet, the high degree of processing and packaging of American food products. We should recognize that diets can be very simple but yet high quality. In terms of nutrition we could forego much of the processing and packaging of foods without great loss.

But does the consumer want this? If so, we must face up to the sacrifices of convenience and variety and to hundreds of thousands of jobs that would be lost.

Our insatiable demand for more and more, for better and better more more food, more leisure time, more social program benefits of this or that), with lower taxes and lower productivity is certainly basic to today's problems.

The costs of social governance at all levels are so great as to be like a volcano rising from the desert floor to spew its hot lava on us all. If the demands for more and more governance costs are not turned aside, then our problems today will be minuscule compared to those of the next generation.●

UKRAINIAN HELSINKI MONITOR QUIETLY DISPATCHED TO THE CAMPS

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. Presient, for weeks now the free world has been expressing its indignation over the severe sentences that Soviet courts have recently meted out to Anatoly Scharansky, Aleksandr Ginzburg, Yuri Orlov, and Vladimir Slepak of the Moscow group to promote observance of the Helsinki accords. And rightly so—for the lifeline of the Soviet monitoring groups is Western public opinion. It is therefore of serious importance that the Western public be informed about the equally reprehensible sentencing of Ukrainian nationalist and Helsinki rights activist Levko Lukyanenko.

LUKYANENKO'S TRIAL FOLLOWS PATTERN—MERCILESS SENTENCE

Equal to his above mentioned colleagues in courage and dedication to their common cause, Lukyanenko's story is no less compelling than theirs, even though it is rarely told in the West. The 4-day trial of Lukanenko took place in the Ukraine, virtually unnoticed by the Western public. The court proceedings were conducted with a disregard for fundamental principles of justice equal to that displayed during the Scharansky, Ginzburg, Orlov and Slepak trials in the environs of Moscow—the courtroom was barred to all but close relatives, and Lukyanenko's final statement was interrupted by the court all of 49 times. Charged under article 62 of the Ukrainian criminal code, "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda", Lukyanenko received the maximum penalty provided for under Soviet law—10 years at hard labor to be followed by 5 years of internal exile. When one considers that Lukyanenko has already spent 15 of his 51 years in the Gulag, the sentence is merciless.

LACK OF PUBLICITY—CALCULATED STRATEGY

Lukyanenko's fate received little comment in the West for several reasons, not the least of which being a calculated strategy on the part of the Soviet authorities to deflect attention away from the potentially dangerous issue of national rights in the Ukraine and other republics by encouraging the Western press to focus on the Moscow dissidents. Another factor that contributes to the lack of extensive reporting afforded Lukyanenko is geography—the trial took place in the Ukrainian town of Gorodnya, where communication with the outside world is severely limited, and Western correspondents' accessibility is quite restricted. These same unfavorable circumstances prevailed during the recent trial of Lithuanian Helsinki monitor Viktoras Petkus, to whom the court delivered a draconian sentence of 15 years (consisting of 3 in prison, 7 in labor camp, and 5 in internal exile) for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda," while hardly any note was taken in the West.

DEEP RESPECT FOR LUKYANENKO AND OTHERS

Levko Lukyanenko stands shoulder to shoulder with Scharansky, Ginzburg, Orlov, and Slepak as an outstanding leader in the struggle for human rights in the U.S.S.R. together with them, he has sacrificed his freedom. It is with deep respect for Levko Lukyanenko that I vehemently protest his conviction, the latest of 17 convictions of Helsinki watch group members to date.●

THE MINNESOTA LEGISLATURE HONORS MIKE OUSDIGIAN

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, during its 1978 session, the Minnesota State Legislature passed a resolution honoring O. M. (Mike) Ousdigian for his many years of public service.

For 40 years, Mike has served as secretary of the Minnesota Public Employees Retirement Association. In this capacity, he has shown himself to be a dedicated and conscientious public servant, performing his duties tirelessly and with a spirit that could serve as an example to many public servants.

But Mike did not rest at being one of the best State government workers in Minnesota. Having experienced the indignities of forced servitude during his youth in Armenia, he was one of those many immigrants who were truly "yearning to breath free." Mike has always had an enthusiasm for America and the American way of life that could put many of us who call ourselves "patriots" to shame. Mike used this love of his adopted land ably in his second career: public speaking. He has won countless awards for speaking on America for attempting to share with others his love for America.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent that the text of Minnesota Senate Resolution No 34, honoring Mike Ousdigian be printed in the RECORD.

I am sure that I am joined by all the Members of the Senate in honoring Mike Ousdigian.

The text of Minnesota Senate Resolution 34 follows:

SENATE RESOLUTION No. 34

Whereas, O. M. (Mike) Ousdigian was born in Armenia of Armenian parentage and was subjected to the horrors of slavery as a prisoner of the Turks as a youth; and

Whereas, Mike arrived in the United States as an immigrant in 1921 bearing the scars of mis-treatment in the slave camp and possessing little other than a keen mind and a sincere desire to succeed in his new homeland; and

Whereas, Mike subsequently became an American citizen in 1926, and was graduated from the University of Pennsylvania in 1931; and

Whereas, Mike has served as Secretary of the Minnesota Public Employees Retirement Association since May 1, 1938; and

Whereas, the experiences of Mike's youth, viewed in contrast with the opportunities of his adult life as an American citizen has instilled in Mike an appreciation of America and the American way of life which has not, and indeed probably cannot, be matched in any native born American; and

Whereas, Mike's avocation as a public speaker on subjects generally relating to America and the American way of life have won him wide acclaim and public speaking awards, including the George Washington Medal of Honor from the Freedom Foundation at Valley Forge, Pennsylvania on two occasions and the Second Americanism Medal from the Daughters of the American Revolution; now, therefore,

Be it resolved, by the Senate of the State of Minnesota, the House of Representatives concurring therein, that the sincere appreciation of the Minnesota Legislature go out to O. M. (Mike) Ousdigian for his long and untiring efforts and achievements as a public servant of the state of Minnesota and as a full time booster of America and the American way of life.●

WAYS AND MEANS ADOPTS INDEXING

● Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the House Ways and Means Committee voted yesterday to adjust the taxation of capital gains caused by inflation. The Senator from Kansas believes this is a significant action.

TAXFLATION

Mr. President, inflation is our No. 1 tax problem. During periods of inflation, the net effect of the current tax system is to push low- and middle-income taxpayers into higher tax brackets without any corresponding increase in their real purchasing power. Indexing the tax system to the rate of inflation would help neutralize the impact of inflation by maintaining the effective rate of taxation for any given income level at the rate originally legislated.

Mr. President, the House Ways and Means Committee has taken an important step toward solving this problem. A recent study concludes that in 1973 individuals paid nearly $500 million in excess tax on capital stock capital gains because of the distorting effect of inflation. That is one-half of a billion dollars collected on nominal fictitious, capital gains. Mr. President, these were not gains—they were not a profit. And the capital gains "tax" was a capital levy, and not a tax.

TAX INDEXATION ACT

Mr. President, on March 13, I introduced S. 2738, the Tax Indexation Act of 1978. That legislation provides for adjustments to the tax rate tables, the zero bracketing amount, the personal exemption, the corporate surtax exemption, individual retirement accounts and Keogh contributions, the gift exclusion, the unified estate credit, the general tax credit, the earned income tax credit, tax credit for the elderly, the child care tax credit, the limitations on investment tax credit, the minimum tax threshold, the current exempt amount for the exchange of personal residence by individuals over age 65, and the basis of assets. The inflation adjustment would be made annually at a rate equal to two-thirds of the increase in the Consumer Price Index.

INDEXING IS REFORM

Mr. President, there is no tax reform that is more important to achieve, easier to accomplish, and fairer in its impact than income tax indexation. The concept is not new. Pension provisions, found in the Tax Code, imposing limits on the amount of employee contributions, are presently indexed. The energy tax bill, pending in conference, contains an index tax on the business use of oil and gas. According to a Congressional Budget Office study, approximately 63 percent of all Federal expenditures are completely indexed or quasi-indexed. Tax indexing is used successfully in a number of Western countries, including Canada.

APRIL 24 HEARINGS

The Subcommittee on Taxation and Debt Management has held hearings on S. 2738, the Tax Indexation Act of 1978. This legislation cosponsored by Senators GRIFFIN, MCCLURE, LUGAR, SCHMITT, LAXALT, DOMENICI, HAYAKAWA, and GARN provides a rational, equitable approach to indexing our tax system.

Mr. President, I am encouraged by the statement of the chairman of the Finance Committee (Mr. LONG) that he would support at least a partial inflation adjustment of capital gains. It is too early to tell whether the bill the House reports will contain a measure indexing capital gains. But regardless, the Senator from Kansas intends to press for indexing of capital gains, and every other provision of S. 2738, when the tax package reaches the Senate.

TAX RELIEF

Mr. President, the American taxpayer has had enough. They have enough of big Government—inflation—and high taxes. Congress has enacted yearly tax reductions for the past 3 years, and still the Congressional Budget Office estimates that taxflation will rob Americans of $45 billion in 1983.

Mr. President, indexing is the answer to this problem. The House Ways and Means Committee is showing us the way. The Senator from Kansas would urge all his colleagues to lend their support. Tax indexing is an idea whose time has come.●

ALASKA: THE WILDERNESS HERITAGE OF ALL AMERICANS

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I am joining today as a cosponsor of the "Alaska National Interests Lands Conservation Act," S. 1500—substitute amendment 2176.

We have an obligation, it seems to me, to recognize the unique importance of this Alaska lands issue. It has quite rightly been called the conservation challenge of the century.

Throughout our history, Americans have generally approached the ever-receding western frontier with a single-minded determination to open the wilderness for development. In Alaska, on our federally owned domain, we have a last chance to avoid that pattern. We can identify and preserve the great natural wonders, the critical wildlife habitat, and the wilderness before the land is parceled out and the resources exploited.

The wilderness of Alaska is a special legacy for all Americans. It is vast, expansive, remote, and wild. It has immense values for our people—values which are fundamental to our culture, to our national character, and to our well-being. It is clear that the people understand this value, and that there is overwhelming public support for preserving our natural heritage of wilderness in Alaska.

I consider S. 1500 to be a "must" bill for the Senate. It is essential that we act, and this bill includes the kind of strong provisions which are required to truly meet the dimensions of this challenge.

Several weeks ago, I wrote to the majority leader to express my hope that the Senate would take up this legislation yet this year. For the information of my colleagues, I ask that the text of my letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., June 29, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT BYRD,
Majority Leader,
U.S. Capitol,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. MAJORITY LEADER: It is my special hope that the Senate can proceed with final action this year on the House-passed Alaska national interest lands legislation.

This is a truly national issue which concerns the natural heritage of parklands, wildlife, and wilderness which every American shares on the federal lands in Alaska. The Congress has done much to expedite the rapid development of much of Alaska, through generous land transfers to the State and through special legislation setting aside or speeding up environmental reviews on the existing oil pipeline and the forthcoming natural gas transportation system.

The Alaska lands legislation presents us the opportunity to bring some balance back into this picture. The areas it proposes, as much refined in the House consideration and now being further refined by the Energy and Natural Resources Committee, have been identified through a thorough study process. We are ready to complete this job and I believe the American people expect us to do so, with this national interest clearly in mind.

The wilderness that would be preserved under this legislation is of particular personal interest to me. It will be given immediate statutory protection within our National Wilderness Preservation System, under the policies set forth in the Wilderness Act of 1964. My husband was the original sponsor of the Wilderness Act, beginning in 1956, and considered it among his proudest legislative accomplishments. In Alaska, we can now apply that landmark conservation law to areas of truly great wilderness protected in advance of the usual process by which such areas get nibbled away and diluted by inconsistent development.

The scale of this legislation is large, but it has fired the imagination of a growing number of our people. I believe the Senate has an obligation to act, and I earnestly request that the scheduling of business during the remainder of this Session include this legislation.

Sincerely,

MURIEL HUMPHREY.●

TRIBUTE TO BAYLOR'S DRAGOONS

● Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, on September 28, the people of River Vale and Bergen County, N.J. will gather to pay tribute to the memory of a handful of loyal soldiers who were killed in their sleep at River Vale during the Revolutionary War.

On this day in 1778 between 11 and 15 members of Colonel Baylor's Third Continental Dragoons were bayoneted by British soldiers and hastily buried in nearby abandoned taning vats.

They were forgotten for about 189 years. Then in 1967 the bones of six of these men were unearthed during an archeological dig in 1967. Their remains were reinterred in a monument erected at the site, and September 28 was designated as "Baylor Memorial Day" in the State of New Jersey. I would like to join the residents of River Vale and the entire State in paying homage and tribute to these men in order to acknowledge the sacrifice made by the members of Baylor's Dragoons. Forgotten for so many years, their deaths will no longer go unnoticed—their patriotism will no longer go unrecognized.

With this bicentennial memorial to the Dragoons' deaths, we will insure that these and all men who lost their lives fighting for the independence of this country will always be remembered and their contribution to our heritage applauded.●

THE DESTRUCTION OF LEBANON

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, over the past 2 years I have attempted to call public attention to the implications to the accelerating pace of destruction in Lebanon. A conflict in Lebanon has raised up enormous physical and human casualties; yet these are no less important than the veritable destruction of the Lebanon democracy.

It strikes me that the Western World at large has been startlingly oblivious of the onslaught against the Lebanese democracy.

Put plainly, what the totalitarian powers have achieved with their arms, with their surrogates, in Lebanon is paradigm of what they have in store for other nearby democracies and for democracy in general. Israel is most immediately affected but surely other democracies might well take note. And yet there continues a tendency to describe events in Lebanon in a manner which seems to exclude Lebanon from the arena of democracy's concern. In October 1977, I spoke in New York City and said:

Permit me just a moment to recall the events of June, 1976, when the American Ambassador to Lebanon Francis Meloy and Robert Waring, our Embassy's economic counselor, were murdered in cold blood and broad daylight in circumstances that clearly implicated—the PLO. PLO spokesmen in Beirut, joined by the PLO's representative at the United Nations, announced that an investigation would be conducted into the killings. They would round up the usual suspects.

The charade continued: The PLO announced that three suspects were in custody, the PLO spokesmen in Beirut this time expressing the view that the three had been working for some outside power, perhaps even the Central Intelligence Agency! And in July of 1976, it was announced to our evident satisfaction and relief that American diplomats in Beirut would henceforth receive PLO protection. I repeat: this was the American government's response—its apparent response—to the destruction of the Lebanese democracy by the arms and the clients of the Soviet Union—of which the PLO is surely among the more prominent.

The American Catholic community chose not to identify itself with its more than one million fellow communicants in Lebanon, while the media, by labeling them "right wing Christians," in effect excommunicated them from the liberal society. Surely a triumph of Newspeak, for their struggle concerned the preservation of a liberal policy, not the creation of an authoritarian one.

In this morning's Wall Street Journal there is a valuable editorial which reviews the background of the violence in Lebanon. I ask that the text of that editorial be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 26, 1978]

THE VIOLENCE OF LEBANON

(NOTE.—For the violence of Lebanon shall cover thee, and the spoil of beasts, which made them afraid, because of men's blood, and for the violence of the land, of the city, and of all that dwell therein.—Habakkuk 2:17.)

The open wound that is Lebanon is noticed only when the bleeding is especially profuse. The Syrian bombardment of Beirut is merely the latest horror. Judging from everything from official statements to journalistic accounts, few American opinion leaders are equipped to understand the Lebanese situation, let alone resolve it.

When the precarious balance of internal Lebanese political power collapsed in 1975, the weak forces of public order went down with it. All that remains are armed gangs—the natives barely controlled by their own chiefs, and the foreigners stirring the pot for their own purposes. Americans, apparently incapable of comprehending the kind of politics driven by religious and dynastic loyalty, frantically try to grasp the situation by sorting out "leftists" and "rightists."

Yet consider the "Progressive Socialist Party," actually Druse (an Islamic heresy) who follow the Jumblatt family. They have been allied to the Moslems and Palestinians. Another Druse group, hereditary enemies of the Jumblatts, have been neutral; the Druse clans in Israel support the Jews against the Palestinians, Christian or Moslem.

Or take the Franjiehists, adherents of an ex-president, the murder of whose son and heir set off the latest round of fighting. In 1976 the Syrians intervened to prevent them from overrunning predominantly Moslem Tripoli in the north, and they were identified as the most extreme right-wing Christians; now allies of Syria, a thoroughly fascist dictatorship, the Franjiehists have become "liberals" to the Western press.

The international aspect is almost equally devoid of ideological content. The Syrians, who were introduced to Lebanon with U.S. blessings, are ruled by a clique of Alaouite Moslems, a small and well-despised minority. Syrian objectives in Lebanon are transparently obvious, once we shake the American convention of viewing international boundaries as representing real frontiers between nations. Until 1944 Lebanon was part of Syria, and the Syrians would like it back, as they would other Syrian territory sliced off by the European imperialists—most of what is now Israel and Jordan.

In 1970, Syria supported the Palestinians against Jordan, but in 1976 the Palestinians were the strongest faction in Lebanon so Syria helped the Christians break them. Now the Christians are dominant, so the Syrians have turned artillery on them in order to enforce their de facto protectorate over Lebanon. This is how an imperial power demonstrates to the natives that it intends to be obeyed.

From the south, Israel is also applying an ancient strategm—divide et imperum. Never adverse to helping the Arabs fall out among themselves, the Israelis eagerly embraced the opportunity to support the Maronite Christians against the Palestinians and to wipe out the PLO bases in south Lebanon, and is now sustaining a Christian "militia" along the border.

The Lebanese situation has some special features. Incredible as it sounds, some in the Israeli-linked force are paid by the Lebanese government, as are a good part of the Christian, Moslem and Druse fighters. Although the Lebanese army broke up three years ago, paymasters wend their way through the rubble to remunerate troops on all sides. With what, you ask? Well, taxes are being collected. The fiscal apparatus of the Lebanese state is still intact. In fact, during the last two years, the Lebanese pound has appreciated 10% relative to the dollar.

The State Department has declared its determination "to take whatever steps we consider necessary to help establish peace and necessary to help establish peace and security in Lebanon." Well, does the situation described above sound like anything Messrs. Vance and Young can understand, much less control? The official U.S. response is depressingly predictable—just stop the fighting, without noticing why the fighting broke out in the first place; form a pluralistic government, forgetting that the civil war is the result of a failure of pluralistic government, and foreigners keep hands off, ignoring the fact that the most unsettling foreign element, the Palestinian refugees, have no place to go.

Lebanon was created in 1944 to be a Christian-dominated state; it broke down because of the higher birth-rate of the Moslems and the introduction of half a million well-armed Palestinians. A democratic Lebanon would be Moslem-ruled and would not be strong enough to control the Palestinians.

Many Maronite leaders are advocating a partition, leaving them in control of a rump Lebanon, but this would require an enormous, and probably bloody, relocation of peoples. Worse, the Maronites are in the center of the country; the south adjoining Israel is inhabited by pro-Palestinian Shiite Moslems. Only Syria could restrain the PLO there, and the Israelis are not about to permit a Syrian presence on their northern frontier.

We're afraid that it's naive to talk of peace in Lebanon, and basing our policy on abstract principles of justice is singularly inappropriate. Who is right in Lebanon depends on which side you are on. The U.S. will best serve its own interests by following the primitive rule of supporting its friends. In the convoluted politics of the Levant, our friends have been the Saudis, the Hashemites of Jordan, the Maronites and the Israelis.●

NOMINATION OF RUTH CLUSEN FOR DOE POSITION

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I applaud the recent nomination by the President of Ruth C. Clusen for the position of Assistant Secretary for Environment in the Department of Energy. The new Secretary for Environment will be responsible for assuring that all departmental programs are consistent with environmental and safety laws, regulations, and policies. She will review and comment upon environmental impact statements from other agencies, prepare policy and legislative EIS's, act as a link to environmental agencies and the environmental community, and assure adequate health and safety measures in DOE programs.

I have known Ruth Clusen for a number of years because of her outstanding work with the League of Women Voters. She has been affiliated with that fine organization for over 26 years. Ruth is a graduate of the University of Wisconsin and taught history for a period of time. She and her husband, David, are residents of Green Bay, Wis.

Since 1952 she has been active in the league in both the local and national scene. It is significant to note that she has held every possible elective office within that civic organization, including membership on the national board. In 1974 she was elected national president of the league, and her term was so successful she was elected for a second term in 1976.

It was in 1976 that she gained national prominence as the person responsible for arranging the televised debates between President Ford and then candidate Carter and Vice Presidential hopefuls Mondale and Dole. The debates helped citizens gain important insights to the positions and character of the candidates.

Ms. Clusen has fought for changes in many areas where reform has long been needed. She has consistently endorsed and worked for programs to improve our environment, provide full employment, reform our welfare laws, improve access to the Government for all citizens, and provide equal rights for women. In 1977 she was one of Ladies Home Journal's women of the year.

I have had the opportunity to know of Ruth's effective leadership because of her strong support for reform of the electoral college. This has been one of my major goals during my years in the Senate, and having Ruth as an ally has been a great asset.

There is no doubt in my mind that Ruth Clusen's education, experience, concern for people, and years of leadership with the league make her an especially well-qualified nominee. She will make an excellent Assistant Secretary for Environment in the Department of Energy. I am sure my colleagues join me in welcoming this fine nomination.●

HMO'S IN THE TWIN CITIES

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, just last week the Senate voted to extend the HMO program and this week we shall soon be considering the Health Planning Act Amendments of 1978.

With both of these pieces of legislation in mind, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues an article which was printed in the National Journal of July 22. The article is entitled "HMO's Are Alive and Well in the Twin Cities Region," and it points out that the Twin Cities appear to be the first large-scale health care market in which there is active price competition involving a majority of the area's hospitals and doctors.

The success of HMO's in the Twin Cities was attributed to a number of reasons. Historically, Minnesotans have favored an open and progressive government; corporate leaders are seriously concerned about social issues; and, the physicians, although strongly independent, have undertaken many innovative programs in health care services.

What this article makes clear is how well the HMO program can function. Such innovative approaches should continue to be considered and encouraged so that health care in the United States will truly become the best and least costly in the world.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

HMOs ARE ALIVE AND WELL IN THE TWIN CITIES REGION

(By John K. Iglehart)

MINNEAPOLIS-ST. PAUL.—Here in the Twin Cities region the marketplace seems to be working for medical care.

In an era when government preaches more competition as an answer to rising health costs while relying in practice on new regulatory controls, doctors and purchasers of health care here are demonstrating that medicine is indeed susceptible to economic incentives.

Consider these developments:

Seven health maintenance organizations (HMOs) now compete for customers against conventional health insurance plans on the basis of price, convenience of service and benefit coverage.

The HMOs now serve 190,000 people, or almost 10 per cent of the area's population, and all have experienced substantial growth in the past year as an increasing number of employers offer their employees a choice between HMOs and traditional insurance coverage.

HMOs have stimulated competitive responses from organized medicine and from Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Minnesota. The Hennepin County Medical Society, a local affiliate of the American Medical Association, has established its own HMO, as have the Blues, to counter the loss of patients.

With their emphasis on keeping the rate at which they hospitalize patients to an absolute minimum, the Twin Cities HMOs are bolstering the number of "surplus" hospital beds in the area. (See box, p. 1161.)

HMO was the label President Nixon attached to his Administration's move to inject the principles of the marketplace into health care. The Carter Administration has picked up on the theme and Health, Education and Welfare (HEW) Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr. has given the concept a high priority.

Health maintenance organizations provide a comprehensive set of medical services no matter how costly they may turn out to be—to voluntarily enrolled members for a predetermined monthly premium. This prepaid feature, as Nixon noted when he first promoted HMOs in 1971 as an answer to soaring medical costs, reverses the "illogical incentive" of fee-for-service medicine: that is, "the more illnesses [doctors] treat and the more services they render, the more their income rises."

Back in 1971, HEW Secretary Elliot L. Richardson testified that by 1976, the department expected 1,700 HMOs to be in operation, serving 40 million members. But today, there are only 175 of the facilities, serving 6.5 million members. The number of people served by HMOs has doubled since 1971, but still represents only 3 per cent of the population.

The Nixon and Carter Administrations emphasized the importance of the HMO concept as a way to infuse medicine with the economic principles consumer choice and price competition that are supposed to discipline any market and the impact of the HMOs is evident in Minneapolis-St. Paul.

But the phemonenon has by no means transformed the Twin Cities into a marketplace mecca, where supply matches demand for medical services with any precision. The area has an acknowledged surplus of hospital beds, more doctors than the medical society's executive director, Thomas W. Hoban, says it needs and a prestigious health complex at the University of Minnesota that has all but ignored the competitive struggle.

Nevertheless, the presence of seven HMOs, competing among themselves and with fee-for-service doctors, is making a difference here.

"The idea of a competitive medical care environment where consumers have a real choice and where most providers are competing with each other on price and other considerations has until now been an attractive but largely theoretical goal," said Dr. Paul M. Ellwood Jr., the physician who sold the HMO concept to the Nixon Administration and who continues to work with HEW to nurture it.

"Selling it to health policy makers has been a difficult task. But the Twin Cities appears to be the first large-scale health care market in which one could say there is active price competition involving a majority of the area's 20 hospitals and approximately 1,700 doctors. If this community is a fair test, then the competitive market strategy appears to work."

Ironically, the federal government has had relatively little to do with HMO growth in Minnesota, and doctors, hospitals and major employers who purchase the bulk of medical care here prefer it that way. Richard T. Burke, acting director of the HMO sponsored by the medical society, said in an interview, "The success of HMOs here has been in direct proportion to the relative lack of government involvement and red tape."

Only one of the seven HMOs here has sought federal qualification, but the Carter Administration is very much interested in HMO developments in the Twin Cities. HEW undersecretary Hale Champion delivered the keynote address on April 29 at the 20th annual meeting of the oldest and largest HMO in the area. Group Health Plan Inc.

Champion discussed the "remarkable growth in HMO enrollment in the Twin Cities from 2 to 10 percent of the population enrolled in just seven years. . . . HMO competition inspires healthy change leading to the formation of more HMOs. This area now has seven. And third-party insurers. Blue Cross particularly, are instituting cost controls and offering fuller benefit packages. Also, physicians are changing their behavior—in some cases moving voluntarily to mandatory cost controls such as preadmission certification, length-of-stay reviews and limitations on fees and charges per visit."

ENVIRONMENT

Minnesota has been a shining light among the states in many respects. And most things of note within the state are concentrated in the Twin Cities orbit.

The environment of Minneapolis-St. Paul, which historically has favored an open and progressive government, a conservative but constructive private sector and a medical care industry willing to innovate, has been instrumental in fostering HMOs.

Time and again, individuals involved in the development and promotion of HMOs here cite the importance of these ingredients. "Corporate leaders are reasonably liberal on social issues here," said Paul L. Parker, executive vice president of the Minneapolis-based General Mills Inc. "They don't raise the spectre of Communists around every corner."

Physicians in the Twin Cities have displayed more tolerance for innovation than their counterparts in most other sections of the country, though they remain a fiercely independent breed. Fee-for-service doctors long have practiced in group settings in Minnesota, for instance. But the climate for development of group practices operating on the basis of fixed premiums and with a consumer-dominated board was chilly when the first HMO was established here in the mid-1950s.

Group Health Plan, now the largest HMO in the Midwest with 108,000 members, was conceived originally in 1939 by a group dedicated to the consumer cooperative movement. It was not until 1955, however, that a favorable ruling by Minnesota's attorney general made the HMO concept a viable alternative to fee-for-service medicine.

In that opinion, Attorney General Miles W. Lord declared that a corporation may organize on a nonprofit basis to provide "means whereby the members of this corporation may secure for themselves and their families and dependents comprehensive prepaid medical and dental care."

Organized medicine fought vigorously to block creation and development of the Group Health Plan. The Minnesota State Medical Association's House of Delegates, in May 1956, resolved to be "officially and specifically opposed to the practice of medicine by corporations of any character or purpose because such practice is opposed to the best interests of physicians and the public and because such practice does not conform to the law governing medical practice in the state of Minnesota."

The Federal Trade Commission, in an August 1977 stag report on the competitive impact of HMOs, reported that during the early years of its existence, "Group Health Physicians were denied access to hospitals, were socially ostracized and were subjected to professional ridicule.

A physician who works in one of the HMOs that is more directly linked to traditional medicine conceded in an interview, "Group Health Plan was not seen as legitimate by most doctors here until recently." In the early 1970s, almost 15 years after Group Health Plan was created, a number of forces converged that led not only to a doubling of the plan's enrollment but to the formation of six more HMOs, including one established by medical society physicians who once denounced the concept.

Nixon's early pronouncements on behalf of the HMO concept formed a foundation for later developments. The leading salesman of the idea was Ellwood, president of InterStudy, a Minneapolis-based health policy research organization. "Paul doesn't get the credit he deserves for pushing HMOs here because by the time they caught on, he had already moved into other things," said the medical society's Burke, one of three former InterStudy employees who today directs HMOs in the Twin Cities region.

The corporate community also became involved. "Back in 1971 and 1972, our company was pursuing the concept of what we call 'alternatives to conventional philanthropy,'" Parker of General Mills told an HEW conference on HMOs on March 10.

"Like every other good corporate citizen, we were writing checks for the United Way, various colleges and universities, social agencies and the arts. We were thinking out loud as to whether business with its presumed managerial skills might do more for society if it concentrated less on check writing than on managing and operating in the nonprofit area, with the bottom line being social gain, not earnings per share.

At this fortuitous time, Parker said, Dr. Leon Warshaw, an officer of the Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States, asked General Mills and other local firms if they would like to look into HMOs. "Dr. Warshaw wanted us to join him in a three-year project to study the feasibility of an HMO central services organization, and our only quarrel with his proposal was that we felt it was time not for study but for action."

General Mills, 10 other large corporations and eight insurance companies banded together to promote the HMO concept in a new organization they called the Twin City Health Care Development Project. The project was reconstituted in 1976 as the National Association of Employers on Health Maintenance Organizations. The association remains headquartered in Minneapolis but has a national membership of 160 corporations, most of which are of the Fortune 500 variety. An association brochure says it is "for those companies who are interested in containing health care costs and exploring alternative health care delivery systems."

EVOLUTION

The diversity of origin and organizational structure of HMOs in Minneapolis-St. Paul is striking. All are nonprofit organizations, as required by Minnesota's state law, and six of them were created within the past five years.

Since 1971, total HMO enrollment has increased from 1.9 percent of the area's population to 9.8 percent, an increase of 153,189 enrollees. "Since total population grew very little [2.9 percent] during this time period, increases in HMO enrollment took place primarily at the expense of Blue Cross-Blue Shield and private insurers," according to Jon B. Christianson, an economist at InterStudy who published a report last April entitled, Do HMOs Stimulate Beneficial Competition?

The vast majority of HMO members in the Twin Cities, Christianson said, are "a very desirable category of consumers from the standpoint of both fee-for-service physicians and insures the employed, middle-income family".

The second largest HMO in the area is MedCenter, formed in 1972 by the St. Louis Park Medical Center, a previously fee-for-service multi-specialty group practice of 107 physicians based in suburban Minneapolis.

St. Louis Park doctors became enamored of the HMO concept in 1970. "Group Health was killing them" by taking patients away, according to Burke, who served as the first staff director of MedCenter. But the activity of General Mills also played a key role because most of its corporate employees were fee-for-service patients at St. Louis Park. Ellwood also was instrumental in helping MedCenter get started.

"Most of our doctors would have preferred that nothing happen," said one of them. "But if HMOs were going to become an important new dimension in medicine, we wanted a piece of the action."

Today, 30 per cent of the income and patient visits of the St. Louis Park facility come from its 32,000 enrolled HMO members. The fee-for-service and HMO concepts operate compatibly at the medical center and its staff is aggressively seeking new business.

The Ramsey Health Plan, a hospital-based HMO also created in 1972, initially served only the employees of Ramsey County (St. Paul). But in 1976, the organization began marketing to other groups and now counts 4,000 members.

The SHARE Health Plan was sponsored originally by a mutual benefit association for railroad employees. It was reorganized and became operational in 1974. SHARE is the only HMO in the area to apply for and win federal certification, but ironically, the government's stamp of approval probably has been more beneficial to other HMOs than to SHARE.

The 1973 federal HMO law requires employers of 25 or more workers to offer the option of HMO benefits if a federally certified plan operates in the area. But when SHARE approaches an employer to request that its employees be given a choice between a traditional health insurance plan and an HMO, the employer invariably offers its workers access to more HMO plans than simply SHARE's.

"Federal certification has been very helpful to our competitors," SHARE's medical director, Dr. Richard Webber, said in an interview. "Its real advantage to us was it enabled SHARE to receive a $850,000 federal start-up loan." SHARE now has 18,000 members and is regarded by HEW as one of the most successful HMOs launched with federal subsidies.

The Nicollet-Eitel Health Plan is a product of a joint commitment by the Nicollet Clinic and Eitel Hospital, a 144-bed institution in downtown Minneapolis. The clinic is a well-established multi-specialty group practice with 45 doctors, all of whom have staff appointments at Eitel Hospital.

Jack Rivall, Eitel's administrator, conceded in an interview that his institution's interest in the HMO concept involved only a "bit of altruism. The major incentive was to guarantee a future for our institution, which is the smallest acute care hospital in Minneapolis—3 per cent of the patient days."

Nicollet-Eitel's 6,500 HMO members have helped stabilize the patient base at Eitel Hospital. In a city where patient days declined 10 per cent in 1977 compared with the previous year, "Eitel is holding its own in a declining market," Rival said.

HMO in Minnesota is a network of independent physician groups throughout the state that contract with Blue Cross and Blue Shield to provide medical care to an enrolled population on a prepaid basis. After opening in September 1974, HMO in Minnesota experienced a period of slow growth because the Blues initially lacked "a total corporate commitment to make the HMO work," George Halvorsen, director of affiliated services for Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Minnesota, said in an interview.

The erosion of the Blue's conventional business in Minnesota forced the organization to upgrade its HMO activities. HMO in Minnesota now has 13,500 members, an increase of 10,000 in the past 18 months, but the Blues continue to lose business. The first time Honeywell Inc. offered its Twin Cities employees an option in 1977, one-third of its workers, or about 4,000 people, dropped the conventional Blue Cross coverage and chose an HMO plan.

"The growth of our traditional insurance program would have been a lot higher without the HMOs here, there's no doubt about that," Halvorsen said. Some of the Minneapolis-Honeywell employees switched to the Blues' HMO network, but most opted for the newest HMO in Minneapolis-St. Paul—the Physicians' Health Plan, incorporated in December 1974 under the sponsorship of the Hennepin County Medical Society.

The Physicians' Health Plan (PHP) is based on an HMO model known as the independent practice association, in which individual physicians continue to practice in their own offices and bill the plan directly, but agree to seek prior approval from the plan before hospitalizing a patient and to submit their claims to review by other physicians.

Physicians' Health Plan has grown to 15,000 members, but its early years have been accompanied by financial shortfalls that have required the doctors to impose upon themselves the kinds of controls that most had associated only with the government.

SIGNS OF COMPETITION

The American health care system offers consumers of medical services few real opportunities to shop for care in the same way that they might for an automobile on the basis of price, range of options or ready access to treatment or repair.

"In the system of fee-for-service, cost reimbursement and third-party intermediaries that dominate health care financing today, the question of efficient use of resources does not even arise," Professor Alain C. Enthoven of the Stanford University Graduate School of Business told the Massachusetts Medical Society on May 22.

"The problem of how best to spend a given amount of money for the health care of a population is not posed. Providers are not required to set priorities, look at alternatives and make hard choices," Enthoven said. "From the point of view of the provider, there is an apparently unlimited amount of money. This system rewards cost-increasing behavior with more revenue; it punishes cost-reducing behavior with less revenue."

Christianson said in his HMO report that under the current medical care system, "consumers have little reason for price-consciousness in their choice of providers. Consequently, health care costs grow at a 12 percent annual rate, with yearly increases in insurance premiums of 50 per cent not uncommon."

He noted that "business has borne much of this cost increase. While the average weekly salary of an employee increased 85 per cent between 1964 and 1975, employer contributions for health-related benefits rose by over 180 per cent during the same period."

Despite the growth of HMOs, 90 per cent of the two million residents of metropolitan Minneapolis-St. Paul continue to be insured through traditional private health insurance plans or government-sponsored programs such as medicare and medicaid. Thus, the majority of citizens there remain oblivious to the growing struggle for health dollars that now engages doctors, hospitals and those who pay for medical care.

But signs of competition are emerging for two primary reasons: 57 local employers now offer their employees a choice between HMOs and conventional insurance coverage and most health care providers are vying for this business. "The employers have created a competitive environment in medical care here," said Ted Kolderie, executive director of The Citizens League, an influential civic organizations in the Twin Cities.

Among major employers offering their employees a choice are General Mills, Control Data Corp., Minnesota Mining and Manufacturing Co. (3M), Pillsbury Co., Cargill Inc., International Multifoods Corp., Dayton Hudson Corp., Honeywell Inc., and the Prudential Insurance Co. Significantly, more than half of the Minneapolis-St. Paul employees of Prudential, a major indemnity insurer, have opted for HMO coverage.

The first step in the competitive struggle for HMOs, though, is to convince employers to offer their workers this alternative form of health care delivery. Once offered, the attitude of the employer plays a critical role in determining an HMO's success in penetrating that market.

"HMO administrators and marketing agents identify the enthusiasm of the employer as a primary factor determining the ability of HMOs to enroll employees," Christianson said in his report. "They believe that when employers allow HMOs to market directly to employee groups, the HMO enrollment share is substantially increased for initial enrollments. . . . Businesses with a significant employee enrollment in HMOs emphasize convenience of HMO access points as the major factor in determining employee willingness to choose HMO care. Those businesses with extremely low initial employee enrollments point to the magnitude of the additional employee contribution required for HMO membership as the determining negative factor."

In striving to market their services, HMOs in the Twin Cities have sought to differentiate their products. Physicians' Health Plan markets itself as distinct from the other plans because enrollees can retain their family physicians in virtually all instances. Blue Cross-Blue Shield emphasizes its long-standing experience in health insurance when it tries to sell HMOs in Minnesota to potential enrollees who are uncertain about the concept.

The five "group practice" HMOs emphasize the integrated nature and presumably high quality of care rendered in a multi-specialty group setting. And both SHARE and the Ramsey Health Plan, lacking multiple locations, stress that all medical care, outpatient as well as hospital services, is provided conveniently at one location in a personalized manner by a relatively small staff.

Group Health Plan and MedCenter market their extensive satellite facility networks and their financial stability and membership size, while the Nicollet-Fitel Health Plan sells the stability and reputation of its medical group and the convenience of its two satellite facilities.

HMO benefits are more comprehensive and sometimes more expensive than those marketed by conventional insurance plans. The major items covered by HMOs, but not by indemnity plans, are routine visits to a physicians office, physical examinations, immunization and other preventive services.

"HMOs are most often in the position of trying to sell more benefits at a higher price when competing with standard insurance plans, with many of these benefits mandated by Minnesota state law," Christianson said.

The precise role of price competition in the struggle between HMOs and indemnity insurance is difficult to pin down. Competition has forced all of the health plans here to keep their monthly premiums within about $15 of each other, with HMOs generally higher because of the more extensive coverage.

No single price comparison would accurately depict the relative cost of each plan because of the variables involved, but in general, the difference between HMO and conventional insurance costs has diminished because the cost of the latter has risen more rapidly.

In selected instances, HMOs that once were more expensive are now less so, compared with indemnity coverage. At General Mills, for example, the corporation first offered its employees an HMO option in March 1973. Family HMO coverage cost the worker $9 a month, while the regular insurance plan required no employee contribution. Today, General Mills foots the entire bill for both forms of coverage, $103 per family per month for indemnity coverage and $93 for HMO membership but eventually, Parker said, the company would have to decide whether it should permanently subsidize the employee who selects the more expensive health insurance coverage or require the worker to pay the extra cost. (For another example, see box, p. 1165.)

In calculating their rates, HMOs are no more altruistic than the private insurance business. They are able to offer their members more health care per dollar because they aggressively control the rate at which they hospitalize their members, a lesson that Physicians' Health Plan doctors learned only after flirting with bankruptcy.

HMOs in Minneapolis-St. Paul have hospital utilization rates that range from 375 to 650 days per 1,000 members a year. The annual hospital bed rate for the metropolitan population is 1,350 days per 1,000 individuals, but this includes the elderly. The vast majority of HMO members in the Twin Cities are employed individuals and their families. In their number are few elderly persons whose hospitalization rate is high.

DOCTORS

When individual fee-for-service doctors decided in 1974 to join the HMO movement here, they had no idea that the result would be fiscal chaos and the ultimate imposition of strict cost controls to save the Physicians' Health Plan from failure.

The physicians, under the aegis of the medical society had created the independent practice HMO plan to counter the loss of patients to competing organizations.

But after two years of operation, PHP faced a deficit of $700,000, the result of start-up costs and a gross miscalculation of how many days of hospitalization HMO members would require. HMO premium rates had been calculated on the basis of 575 bed days a year per 1,000 enrollees, but from March through December 1976, the actual rate was 643 bed days per 1,000. And, once maternity benefits took effect, hospital use exceeded 700 days per 1,000. Use of outpatient laboratory and x-ray services also exceeded projections.

"We kept telling doctors they could practice medicine as they always had," said Dr. Richard Simmons, chairman of the PHP board, "but we found out we were wrong."

Voluntary sanctions were imposed, including a hospital pre-admission notification program and an agreement that PHP would pay doctors only 70 cents of every dollar in billed claims. But the controls had little impact. In the first quarter of 1977, bed days per 1,000 members rose to 744. In June 1977, the plan's board informed the 1,200 member physicians that "drastic measures are necessary to get medical costs under control, or go out of business."

The doctors opted for controls to wipe out their mounting deficit, including a closely monitored pre-admission hospital certification and length-of-stay review program. A doctor must now call PHP for advance approval of all but emergency admissions. At that time, a length of stay is agreed upon.

Other mandatory controls include more stringent limits on mental health and chemical dependency services (for one quarter of 1977, mental health and chemical dependency—drug abuse and alcoholism—cases accounted for 30 per cent to 35 per cent of total bed days) limitations on physicians' fees and charges for office visits and controls on pharmacists' fees and review of their services.

Thomas Hoban, the county medical society's executive dirctor, said in an interview: "Without the competition, we could not have imposed those controls. The doctors would not have tolerated those controls, but they're willing to go along with the system because they feel it is important to have a stake in the HMO market. Nearly every major industry in town has made a commitment to offer the HMO option."

To remain price competitive, PHP may have to limit hospital stays to the more efficient institutions in the area. This could lead to substantial physician disenchantment because doctors today are free to select the hospitals of their choice, regardless of their rates.

"One of the weaknesses of the independent practice model is that we cannot tell doctors which hospitals to use," PHP director Burke said. "But we do have some leverage by pointing out to doctors that if they limit their practices to the most efficient hospitals, they are more likely to receive 100 percent of their billed charges."

THE FUTURE

The medical care market in Minneapolis-St. Paul clearly is in a state of ferment. The presence of HMOs has shattered long-standing relationships among patients, physicians and hospitals, and predicting future developments is a shaky exercise.

Major parties with a stake in the economics of health care, including government and organized labor, still have not been heard from or at best have played only limited roles in the struggle here.

Federal and state laws helped shape the competitive environment by requiring employers to offer their employees, on request, a choice between HMO and indemnity insurance coverage. But neither level of government has nurtured the HMO movement by purchasing services directly from these facilities, a shortcoming that afflicts HMOs throughout the country.

HMOs in the Twin Cities virtually have no members who receive care under medicare or medicaid. Medicare, the federal program that provides care to some 25 million elderly citizens, reimburses HMOs on a basis that gives the HMOs no financial incentive to enroll patients who generally need health care about twice as often as younger people.

The state of Minnesota has not aggressively pressed HMOs to enroll beneficiaries of medicaid, a federal-state program that underwrites the health care of poor families. Without the enrollment of a segment of society's most vulnerable citizens, HMOs can hardly lay claim to being the answer to the health cost problem.

The HMOs are apprehensive about potential government regulatory actions that could impede their operations. For example, a state-sponsored hospital rate review program administered by the Minnesota Hospital Association takes a dim view of price discounts that some HMOs have negotiated with selected hospitals. (For a report on state regulation of hospital costs, see NJ, 7/1/78, p. 1045.)

Group Health Plan and Fairview Hospital, to which it sends most of its patients, currently are embroiled in a debate with state regulators over the discounted hospitalization rate the HMO pays.

"If Group Health is prevented from negotiating a discounted rate, such an action would protect hospitals from effective price competition, and I submit that would be counter to efforts to contain costs," said Dean A. Lund, assistant to the general manager of Group Health Plan.

The state regulators question whether such discounts represent unfair subsidization of HMO patients. Ironically, the two individuals in the rate review program who are involved in the debate and leaning against discounts that are not strictly "cost justified" are two former InterStudy employees Gary Appel and Fred Sattler.

Howard Veit, director of the federal HMO program, said in an interview two weeks after he visited Minneapolis-St. Paul and discussed developments with its HMO directors. "Our basic view of that area is that it represents in many ways the prototypical community for the future development of HMOs.

"With 10 per cent market penetration, the HMOs there have demonstrated that this form of health delivery is very, very marketable in many communities, despite significant physician resistance in some quarters. HMO development there, though, has not been well coordinated, but rather ad hoc. One could argue that if several of the smaller HMOs pooled their resources, even greater economies could be achieved."

The Twin Cities HMO saga hardly is complete, but as it unfolds, it will give the federal government an opportunity to observe what happens when the forces of marketplace competition are applied to the practice of medicine.●

BALLET FOLK

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the Wall Street Journal, on July 21, carried an article by Ted Stanton, the managing editor of the Daily Idahonian in Moscow, Idaho, on Ballet Folk, an Idaho dance company begun on a shoestring a few years ago which has now prospered, with a schedule that takes it from small towns in Idaho to large cities on the east coast.

A major part of the success of this innovative dance company has been the availability of Federal funds from the National Endowment for the Arts, which has made it possible for audiences, which would not otherwise have such an opportunity, too see fine performances by talented performers.

Mr. Stanton's article demonstrates how worthwhile the National Endowment program has been to small companies, such as Ballet Folk. Mr. President, I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 21, 1978]

THE PUBLIC ARTS DOLLAR: IT HAS THEM DANCING IN IDAHO . . .

(By Ted Stanton)

Moscow, IDAHO.—The boom in professional dance has reached across the country to the woods and plains of Idaho. Dance superstars such as Nureyev and Baryshnikov don't penetrate the Idaho backwoods, but Ballet Folk does and the crowds love it.

The rapid growth of Ballet Folk of Moscow—based in north Idaho, not central Russia—reflects the surge in popularity of dance in America. The company, started eight years ago, now tours from Oregon to the Midwest, South and East Coast. It also goes down past Hells Canyon to Riggins, deep into the woods at Orofino and St. Maries, Idaho, and to many more Northwest towns and cities.

In Enterprise, Ore., Ballet Folk sold 1,500 tickets to enthusiastic adults and children for two performances. The town's population is 1,700. A Lewiston, Idaho, third grader wrote her school newspaper, "It was beautiful, modern, exciting and far out."

The company's shows draw loggers and farmers, townspeople and students, with dress ranging from jogging suits to jeans to evening gowns. At around $3, a ticket is out of almost nobody's range.

"Many of our audiences are unfamiliar with dance," says Joan Muneta, business manager of Ballet Folk. "They're surprised to see quality dancing in, say, a small logging town, and surprised to find they are enjoying it."

Ballet Folk and other professional companies face a critical point this summer: The first-come, first-served approach to federal funding of dance, which fueled the past decade's boom, is about at an end. The change, to financing based largely on judgments of quality, will cut off funds for some companies. Those surviving the cut will benefit, however, because fewer companies will share the pot.

"In part, it was a question of having many companies existing or having fewer companies making a pretty good living," says Nello McDaniel, the National Endowment for the Arts' Dance Touring Program Coordinator for the West and head of the Western States Art Foundation in Denver. Federal dance funding comes from the National Endowment for the Arts through its Dance Touring Program. It filters down to the companies principally in the form of subsidies to organizations sponsoring dance programs. The endowment will pay the sponsor up to 30% of the company's fee.

The subsidies began in 1965, with companies that met bookkeeping and other quantitative requirements qualifying. Requests came in and the money went out, until the year's allocation had been distributed. Each year more companies qualified; 189 were on the books this year, up 38 from last season. Last weekend they were all being reviewed by a 23-member national panel. Next week the National Endowment's council will act on the panel's recommendations of which companies to support. Quality will be paramount, but money won't be cut off if that would wipe out a company, says Arlene Shuler, dance program administrator. "We'll look at other things. Certainly, the company's importance to the region will be a factor." She notes that Ballet Folk, for example, "plays to audiences that otherwise would never see a ballet."

"Without the program," says Ballet Folk cofounder Carl Petrick, "we couldn't maintain a company to tour Idaho. The state could support a company for maybe three months, but not a year. With a three-month season, we couldn't keep high-quality dancers here."

In 1971, Mr. Petrick and his wife, choreographer Jeannette Allyn, then both in their 20s, started with a few ballet classes in a ramshackle Moscow store. They taught youngsters and some of the children's parents, lived in the back of the store and went to classes at the University of Idaho. The store offered space, a hotplate and a cold-water shower. The classes caught on quickly; in the second year the Petricks got hot water. They incorporated in 1972, got an Idaho Arts and Humanities grant and with a $17,000 budget toured Idaho. Six dancers, all from Idaho, earned $25 a show, and had outside jobs in order to eat.

By 1975, the budget was at $190,000 with Ballet Folk's reputation growing and the Petricks and Mrs. Muneta proving deft in getting grants and encouraging local donations. In 1976–77 it spurted to $282,000 as the Dance Touring Program embraced the company. Last season Ballet Folk had 11 dancers, all with professional experience around the country. They worked on nine-month contracts at $425–$475 a month and did 82 performances from coast to coast.

The company uses classical ballet techniques to express and interpret American themes. Its repertoire has ranged from an exuberant "Hoedown," to "The Rainmaker" done to Aaron Copland music, to a jazz ballet, to lyrical choreography accompanied by the music of Judy Collins, Jim Croce and other modern artists. Traveling by bus, the company carries its own lights, floor covering and sound system to play the recordings. It often has workshop and performance residencies of two to five days at colleges, but over half its performances are one-night stands in big and small communities. These are usually in high school gyms, Mr. Petrick notes, because "while some schools have stages, all schools have gyms."

Is the company good enough to meet the endowment's quality test? Western coordinator McDaniel notes that Ballet Folk has a "good reputation throughout the West," and sponsors almost always ask it back. Touring Program officials saw Ballet Folk in Washington, D.C., this year and cited it favorably in asking Congress for funds.

Ballet Folk hasn't been reviewed by leading critics, however, and that might be a reason to play major cities, says Mr. Petrick, who was recently named director of the state arts and humanities commission, leaving company direction to Miss Allyn and Mrs. Muneta.

However, he adds, "New York doesn't need us nearly as much as they do in St. Maries, Idaho."●

SUGAR PRICES

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, the soils of southern Minnesota and the Red River Valley are rich and productive, a valuable gift to Minnesota and its people. But for the sugar beet farmers there, the soil might as well be solid rock, because sugar prices have reached "rock-bottom" and Minnesota sugar beet farmers are actually losing money to work the long, hard hours necessary to grow their crops. They are going further into debt, some are going broke, and there will be fewer sugar beet farmers in Minnesota next year.

These family farmers are confused and, frankly, so am I. The on-again, off-again attitude of the administration toward implementation of a fair sugar program has them frustrated and unsure of their future and the future of the sugar industry in this country.

One year ago President Carter assured our Nation's sugar growers that he was committed to maintaining a "viable" domestic sugar industry. Yet, last autumn, we were still waiting for the USDA to initiate the import management program specifically asked for by Congress months before the 1977 farm bill. Cheap imports continued to flood our domestic market, undercutting the American sugar grower.

Due to the delays in implementing this program, when these import management fees were finally imposed, they were too little; and since then, the USDA has been sluggish in raising them to congressionally mandated levels.

Minnesota commissioner of agriculture, Bill Walker, has shared with me a letter he wrote to Secretary of Agriculture Bergland regarding the problems these low duties have caused Minnesota sugar beet growers. Mr. President, I feel it would be valuable for all my colleagues to read this letter, and I request unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Saint Paul, Minn., July 3, 1978.

Hon. BOB BERGLAND,
Secretary, U.S. Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SECRETARY BERGLAND: On June 19, 1978, you announced and caused to be published in the Federal Register on June 21, 1978, a request for comments on sugar imports and the imposition of import fees, expressing your own intention to make specific recommendations to the President of the United States in this regard.

As Commissioner of Agriculture for the State of Minnesota, I am extremely concerned about the continuing impact of imports upon our distressed domestic sugar industry. As you know, our region of the country (Minnesota and North Dakota) over the last five years has provided this nation with a substantial increase in domestic beet sugar production; the most dramatic increase in decades. This increase was brought about as a result of a tremendous commitment of money by our farmers, both directly and indirectly.

Of increasing concern to us is the competition from foreign suppliers of sugar to the United States. We are not afraid of competition in and of itself; however, we understand that the tentative findings by the Treasury Department indicate that at least two of the countries in the European Economic Community (Belgium and France) are heavily subsidizing their export to this country.

This kind of competition is impossible for the domestic sugar industry to deal with on its own. It requires a commitment from Washington similar to the one made by our farmers when they invested in sugar production.

To that end, import fees must be established and enforced in such a way as to recognize our domestic sugar industries costs and its importance. In order to be realistic they should be calculated quarterly so as to reflect changes in costs. Fees on imported sugar should at least fully offset any cost advantage over domestic sugar; based on a 17 cent minimum national price support.

It is important, I feel, that the President understand that the sugar import fee and sugar support price issues are inseparable; they are not merely of vital consequence to domestic sugar producers, but equally vital to the world sugar industry. The United States, to a greater degree than any other nation, sets the world sugar prices because of its import dependency.

Sincerely,

BILL WALKER,
Commissioner.

Mr. President, this letter concerns adjustments in the current sugar program resulting from the de la Garza amendment to the 1977 farm bill. This program will expire at the end of the 1978 crop year.

Most of us here today agree about the importance of and the need to keep our domestic sugar industry alive and healthy. The current program has helped, although not enough to guarantee the health of our sugar industry through the coming years. To replace this program, my distinguished colleague, Senator FRANK CHURCH, has introduced S. 2990, the Sugar Stabilization Act of 1978, which I have been honored to cosponsor. This bill will authorize U.S. participation in the International Sugar Agreement, require a sugar price support program at an initial 17-cent-per-pound level, and mandate the use of import fees to balance imports with any domestic demand our home industry cannot meet.

Mr. President, a long-range, responsive domestic sugar policy is long overdue. Everyone—farmers, consumers, sugar field, and factory workers—are getting tired of roller-coaster, boom-and-bust cycles and prices. One year the farmer suffers from drastically low prices, and the next year the consumer is burdened with high prices at the retail counter because farmers have cut back or gone broke. One year the sugar field or plantworker has a job, and the next year he is laid off with no income. It is in everyone's best interest to seek dependable and stable prices for sugar. The best way to do this is to have a healthy sugar industry in this country.

Allowing our sugar producers to receive the price they have earned and deserve will keep them in business and will avoid forcing the American consumer to pay cartel prices later. If this Nation wants to reduce inflation and keep it under control, we must set long-range goals. Making sure that the American consumer will have the opportunity to buy from U.S. sugar beet and cane producers at reasonable prices in the future is such a goal.

S. 2990 would go a long way toward reaching this goal. The Sugar Stabilization Act of 1978 is the type of long-range program a responsible and concerned government should implement. I urge my colleagues in the Senate to support this important and long overdue legislation.●

GIVE RHODESIA A CHANCE

● Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the following article presents the feelings of many Americans. I ask that the article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

GIVE RHODESIA A CHANCE

(By Sir Robert Thompson)

On New Year's Eve, if all goes according to plan, a white-settler minority that has ruled Rhodesia for more than half a century will turn the government over to the country's black majority. A new Central African nation, to be called Zimbabwe—after an extinct civilization of that area—will be born. Zimbabwe (Zim-'bäb-we) stands a good chance of becoming a showplace of democracy, prosperity and interracial harmony. It also is one place where Soviet expansion into Africa can be stopped dead in its tracks.

During the last two decades, 40 or so African countries have received independence from European rule. Although born in high hope, most soon become one-party systems, some ruled by bloodthirsty military tyrants such as Uganda's Idi Amin. Often white racism has been replaced by black racism. The economies of many of those new nations have stagnated, and some have gravitated into the Soviet orbit.

Zimbabwe, however, promises to be the exception. As I found during a recent visit, the black leaders who will take over on December 31 are committed to moderate, reasonable policies and friendship with the West. Despite racial discrimination in the past, they want whites to remain and assist in Zimbabwe's development. Unlike some dictators in Africa, Zimbabwe's new leaders have—in the opinion of experts I talked to—the support of a substantial majority of the country's six million blacks, as well as most of its 270,000 whites.

Problem Child. Rhodesia, as the country will continue to be known until the changeover to black rule, is one of Africa's most prosperous countries. Its farms produce far more food than needed and, with further irrigation, agricultural production could be quadrupled. Rhodesia also has extensive deposits of the world's best-quality chrome ore as well as of other valuable minerals. Its fledgling industries are the envy of many of its neighbors. And it has one of the best black educational systems in Africa.

Nevertheless, this year's settlement between the whites and the moderate black leaders is a surprising development. From its formal establishment in 1923, Rhodesia had been a self-governing British colony, and the white minority ran the government pretty much to the exclusion of the black majority. During the early 1960s, while European governments were granting freedom to their African dependencies, Britain pressed Rhodesia's whites to turn control over to the blacks gradually. The whites responded by declaring their independence in 1965.

Not a single country recognized the rebel regime. At Britain's behest, the United Nations imposed a trade ban on Rhodesia to force the whites to capitulate. Black guerrilla movements sprang up, aimed at toppling the white regime. And, Moscow stepped in to manipulate the guerrilla movements to its advantage.

Now, because of international isolation and guerrilla pressures, the whites are relinquishing control, and the settlement is bound to have important international consequences. If Zimbabwe can show that whites have nothing to fear from black rule, the experience could help to solve the explosive racial problems of neighboring South Africa, where 4.3 million whites dominate 19 million increasing restive blacks.

Zimbabwe, moreover, may turn out to be a roadblock in the Soviet drive into Africa. One of Moscow's aims is to bring the vast mineral deposits of the southern half of Africa under its political control. It has thus been supplying arms to the Rhodesian guerrilla, and Cuban instructors have been training them.

The Rhodesian guerrillas, who now call themselves the Patriotic Front, are based in neighboring black countries and have waged their struggle for more than ten years. Some of their leaders openly proclaim that they want to turn the future Zimbabwe into a one-party Marxist state, aligning the country with the Soviet Union.

Time and again, the Patriotic Front has been offered the chance to participate in free elections if it renounces violence. But, knowing full well it would be defeated, the front has spurned the ballot box—unless it is allowed first to take control of the army and police, thus enabling it to assure the outcome.

U.S.-British Role. Zimbabwe needs full political and economic support. It cannot go it alone. Washington and London should take the lead in lifting the Rhodesian trade sanctions, now that black majority rule is being achieved.

Yet, incredibly, the American and British governments have refused the support Zimbabwe so richly deserves. Instead, U.S. Secretary of State Cyrus Vance and British Foreign Secretary David Owen have been trying to reconcile the Patriotic Front and the moderates. Vance and Owen argue that if the front is left out of the settlement, Zimbabwe will never have peace and may not be accepted by neighboring African governments. At the same time, there is the fear that, if the front is not placated, it will invite Cuban troops into the conflict.

Rubbish, I say. Attempts at reconciliation of the two sides simply will not work. Guns and votes, like oil and water, do not mix. Many of the guerrilla leaders are terrorists, who can't be coaxed into gentlemanly give and take. They are out to destroy the moderates, not to share power with them.

As a student of guerrilla movements, I realize that the hard core of the Patriotic Front will try to keep up the struggle. I am convinced, however, that many of the rank and file will desert the cause once they see that what they have been fighting for—a black government—has been achieved. With that, the fighting will be reduced to a manageable nuisance and, eventually, die out.

If Zimbabwe succeeds, I think other African states will accept it. Immediate neighbors Zambia and Mozambique stand to benefit from Zimbabwe's food surpluses, its manufactured goods and the reopening of its borders. If, on the other hand, various African regimes refuse to accept Zimbabwe for the time being, so what? Most are dreary one-party states or military dictatorships. And some, notably Angola and Mozambique, are client states of the Soviet Union. There is no reason why Washington and London should curry their favor.

The Cubans may be a real threat, but resolute action—and not spineless appeasement—is the only way to deal with Castro's marauding legions. As former Secretary of State Henry Kissinger stated recently: "We must make clear to other countries that we will not be blackmailed by Cuban troops or by Soviet arms."

Civil-War Menace. If America and Britain continue to withhold their backing, Zimbabwe's new government will be sorey weakened and could collapse. Should the whites leave Rhodesia, a million blacks, now employed in largely white-owned business firms, factories, farms and mines, will be left jobless.

A collapse of the moderate government would be followed by a Patriotic Front takeover—and full-scale civil war. The front consists of two guerrilla movements based largely on tribal lines, which are ancient rivals. One, led by Robert Mugabe and based in Mozambique, is called the Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army. It is formed mostly of Mashona tribesmen who account for about 75 percent of Rhodesia's black population although only a fraction of them are part of the front. The other movement, commanded by Joshua Nkomo and operating from Zambia, is known as the Zimbabwe People's Revolutionary Army. It consists mostly of Matabele tribesmen. An offshoot of the warlike Zulus of South Africa, the Matabeles comprise only about 15 percent of the black population, but they dominated the Mashonas in pre-colonial times.

One of the reasons the forces of Mugabe and Nkomo are based hundreds of miles apart is that this keeps them from killing one another. The two movements have on occasion turned their guns on each other—with hundreds of guerrillas killed in training-camp battles. A takeover by the Patriotic Front thus adds up to a sure recipe for civil war.

In view of this, the white settlers, who are led by Prime Minister Ian Smith, were not about to hand the country over to the Patriotic Front. Instead, Smith struck a bargain last March with three black moderate leaders, bringing them into the government as a prelude to black majority rule. The three are Bishop Abel Muzorewa, an American-educated Methodist clergyman, the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole, a Congressional preacher, and Jeremiah Chirau, a tribal chief.

The Patriotic Front and its supporters portray the three blacks as "puppets" of Smith. This is not true. Muzorewa has an immense following, far greater than any other black leader. He and Sithole are committed black nationalists. Sithole spent ten years in jail because of his political activities. Chirau commands considerable respect among older and more traditional blacks because of his chieftainship.

The transfer of power, moreover, is irreversible. Smith and the three blacks have formed an executive council, which makes all major decisions by consensus. Black and white co-ministers head each of the government's nine ministries. Elections are to be held later this year to form the black government that will take over on New Year's Eve.

What Future? Safeguards for the white minority have been written into the agreement. The whites will have 28 of the 100 seats in Zimbabwe's parliament for ten years—or the duration of two parliaments, whichever is longer. As a bloc, the whites cannot be part of future governments in any kind of coalition. Nor will they have any direct say in national policy. Yet they will be able to hold up fundamental constitutional amendments, which will require at least 78 votes.

Before arriving in Rhodesia, I wondered what future the whites will have. More than one beautiful constitution has been torn up in Africa—and elsewhere. But in talking with black and white leaders, I found a refreshing change in the country's racial politics.

To a man, the black leaders are mindful of the disastrous experiences of Angola and Mozambique, whose economies utterly collapsed after the flight of the Portuguese, and want the whites to stay in Zimbabwe.

Many whites are prepared not only to accept black rule but to cooperate in making a success of it. Here again economic considerations prevail. If the settlement breaks down, all that the whites have built will be swept away in violence, looting and chaos.

Race relations, I found, are remarkably harmonious. White and black politicians are on a first-name basis with each other, and businessmen of both races lunch together in leading restaurants. The University of Rhodesia has long been integrated, and 53 percent of its students are black. Meanwhile, the expected exodus of whites has not reached alarming proportions, and some whites are returning.

The settlement is actually quite close to what Henry Kissinger proposed in 1976. Obviously, it may not be perfect—what political compromise ever is? But the wonder is that there could be any agreement at all after 13 years of white recalcitrance. Now it needs official recognition from America and Britain and a lifting of the trade sanctions.

The hard-core element in the Patriotic Front will try to keep the political-violence pot boiling. But, as it becomes increasingly evident that they are fighting not white racists but freely elected black government, the black populace will cease to support them. Without such support, no insurgency can succeed.

The issue in Zimbabwe is clear cut: are votes or Soviet guns going to triumph? The decent people of Zimbabwe, black and white, will do what they can. It is in the best interests of the United States and Britain to give them a chance.●

JUSTICE—SOVIET STYLE

● Mr. PELL. Mr. President, once again, recent events in the U.S.S.R. compel me to protest Soviet violations of the Helsinki Final Act. Repression of the Soviet Helsinki watchers culminated last week in the trial of Ukrainian human rights activist Levko Lukyanenko who was convicted and given the maximum sentence of 10 years in labor camp to be followed by 5 years in exile. The charge was the all-too-familiar "'anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" leveled at so many Helsinki monitors. In this case, as in the others, the only "crime" was, in fact, an effort to promote compliance with the provisions of the Helsinki Agreement which the Soviet Union signed willingly in August 1975.

The trial of Lukyanenko was, unfortunately, but one in a long series of actions aimed at annihilating the Helsinki monitoring groups. The week before, three other group members were tried, convicted, and sentenced: In Moscow, Anatoly Scharansky, anwd Aleksandr Ginzburg; and in Vilnius, Viktoras Petkus. These 4 convictions bring the total number of Helsinki watchers who have been convicted, since the first group's formation, to 17. Three others remain in prison awaiting trial while two others were stripped of their Soviet citizenship while abroad and are, thus, banished from their country. Yet, despite this concerted crackdown on the Helsinki monitors, new members are taking the place of those imprisoned. During the trials of Scharansky, Ginzburg and Petkus, for example, it was announced that Sergei Polikanov, physicist, had joined the Moscow group.

That Lukyanenko and Petkus received the maximum sentences, while Ginzburg and Scharansky were meted out less severe—though still strict—terms is not insignificant. Soviet authorities have always been more fearful of Lithuanian and Ukrainian nationalists than Jewish refuseniks or Russian democrats and, therefore, deal with them more harshly. In addition, the Soviet authorities apparently hope that the trials of Petkus and Lukyanenko—held far from the watchful eyes of Western correspondents stationed in Moscow—would go unnoticed if conducted during the much publicized and closely followed trials of Scharansky and Ginzburg.

Lukyanenko has already spent 15 years in the Soviet Gulag—over 4 of them in the dread Vladimir prison. During that lengthy imprisonment, Lukyanenko developed a stomach ailment from which he still suffers. He will by 65 years old when he finishes this term and will have spent nearly half his life in Soviet prisons and camps. I urge my colleagues to join me in protesting this recent example of justice—Soviet style.●

KILLERS IN RHODESIA

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, in a recent interview in Salisbury, Rhodesia, Josiah Mushore Chinamano, a follower of the Joshua Nkomo, president of the Communist-backed Zimbabwe element of the African Peoples Union (ZAPU), said that—

Until certain goals and objectives on both sides are met at the negotiating table, one might expect there to be an increasing threat to life across the countryside of Rhodesia, the loss of 50 a day or more.

He said that—

Until meaningful changes are brought about then the war will continue to escalate.

Mr. President, this interview was conducted on the morning of July 14. Later that evening, Chinamano's ominous prediction was implemented in a bloody massacre that killed 17 Africans—including 9 children. This atrocity is characteristic of the horror the Communist guerillas are committing while insisting on the complete surrender of all blacks and whites inside Rhodesia who support the so-called internal settlement.

Since the signing of the Salisbury Agreement on March 3, 1978, the Communists have stepped up their support to Joshua Nkomo and his ZAPU forces. The Patriotic Front has found the murder of Africans to be a useful and irresistable method of exerting political pressure. It is clearly seen that Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe lack the popular support inside Rhodesia to achieve victory in a free election; thus, his answer is to take power through a brutal bloodbath of innocent people.

Mr. President, I have received a very graphic review of this violence as reported in the regional press and I attach these newspaper articles for the RECORD.

The articles follow:

[From the Sunday Mail, July 16, 1978]

TERRORISTS BUTCHER 17 IN REMOTE KRAAL

In a mass killing that virtually wiped out a whole village, 17 Africans—including nine children—were murdered by two terrorists who walked into the kraal, raked two huts with gunfire, shot and bayoneted women and their families, and finally burnt to death nine of the villagers.

There were only five survivors—four of them badly wounded with gunshot and burns.

The massacre—the fourth in three weeks—happened on the borders of the Zwimba Tribal Trust Land and lands of Chief Jeremiah Chirau, a member of the Executive Council and president of the Zimbabwe United People's Organization. It is about 60 km south of Sinoia.

In the atrocity 17 men, women and children were chased into a hut which was set on fire. Some of the victims were shot as they crawled for safety.

The dead included the kraal head, named by security forces as Mr. Makanza (55), two of his wives, his father aged 75, and, among his children, a son, Alfred (5), and another (21) and the son's wife (18).

Also among the dead were two girls (11), others aged five, 13 and eight, and a four-year-old boy.

The massacre by ZIPRA terrorists following Joshua Nkomo happened on Friday night and was discovered yesterday by security forces. A communist-made grenade and 70 spent bullet casings were found at the scene.

Mr. P. K. van der Byl, the co-Minister of Information, who visited the kraal with troops and newsmen, described the grisly scene: "It is too appalling to express one's horror and condemnation adequately."

The deaths came to the bleak flat land at about 7 p.m.

Some families were in their huts; women, children and some men were near the cooking hut; and the kraal head was sitting close by.

HEART JUMPED

The only warning was the barking of a dog. The kraal head's third wife, Mrs. Nhama Gushongo, looked up . . . and her heart jumped in panic.

"There were two young men carrying guns and the guns burnt," she said.

She fled for her life into the bush . . . the only villager to escape unscathed.

Already, behind her as she stumbled across the half-tilled fields, the killing had begun. One terrorist went to a hut, flung open the door, and raked it with machinegun fire.

Five villagers died immediately from gunshot and bayonet wounds.

Outside this hut yesterday were placed the bodies of two men, three children, and a women with a child, who died then or in the later terror.

The second terrorist circled the cooking hut where a group of villagers were gathered. He came across the kraal head and opened fire.

Screaming women and children made the fatal mistake of running inside the hut. The terrorist followed and fired into the huddled, terrified families.

Then he set the roof on fire. The blazing grass collaped almost immediately.

Several tried to crawl away. Two people died at the front of the hut. Another victim, a girl of 11, crawled 200 metres before dying.

Nine charred bodies, mostly children, lay outside the hut yesterday. Some were hideously contorted, features and sexes unrecognisable.

The horror provoked an angry reaction from Mr. van der Byl: "Death at the end of a rope is too good for those who caused the terror and indescribable pain to these people."

Of those who managed to get out, four villagers all suffering from burns and gunshot wounds, were taken to Sinoia hospital, where they were in a serious condition last night.

A security force spokesman said at the scene: "The terrorists are hardcore. It is pitiful to see this sort of thing done to their own kind."

The same two terrorists are believed to have murdered a Mr. Felix, from the same kraal, a few days earlier. His wife, Mabel, was one of Friday's victims.

The massacre was the worst of a growing number of terrorist actions in the area. The two killers were identified as ZIPRA terrorists by speaking Sindebele.

Since July 5, the gang they belong to have been responsible for four murders, and two villagers have been seriously hurt, a security force spokesman said.

Another security force officer said: "The killings here have gone up tenfold in the past month.

"Some of the incidents have been indiscriminate, where someone has been 'fingered'. Someone says a person has a certain political affiliation and these bandits act unmercifully."

Both ZIPRA and ZANLA forces—the latter loyal to to Robert Mugabe, co-leader with Joshua Nkomo of the Patriotic Front—operate in the area, Mr. van der Byl described clashes between these forces as "incipient civil war".

Troops and Police at the massacre scene said that the terrorists followed the dying kraal head to a hut where he had fled and accused him of being a "sell-out"—although security forces said he had no connection with them.

Although the kraal is close to Chief Chirau's homeland, the area is predominantly in support of the United African National Council.

Just a month before the attack on the village it had changed its support from the UANC, led by Bishop Abel Muzorewa, to the Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole's ZANU.

The decision to change, said kraal head's widow Mrs. Gushongo, who had four of her 15 children—one boy and three girls—murdered, was taken at the suggestion of her husband.

She said that before the attack there was no warning it would happen.

After visiting the kraal, Mr. van der Byl said of the children who were "deliberately and mercilessly" killed: "It is a most tragic case."

He attacked world leaders, such as Mr. Andrew Young, the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations, for trying to justify "actions of this sort by so-called liberation movements and freedom fighters."

"If this is freedom fighting, the world has come to a sorry pass."

He said the civilised world had a duty to recognise the present Government, to "put down this sort of thing", and not to back external terrorists. He went on to criticise the support of countries which harboured terrorists and those which provided money to them.

Mr. van der Byl said that Mr. Young had said that the external leaders were fighting for personal power.

"One thing they don't want is the internal settlement to work, so they can use the country as a battlefield to fight for personal power.

"The world must realise this."

There was one last poignant note as newsmen left the ravaged village. Alongside them rode the third wife, clutching a baby.

"I don't know what to do now," she said. "I must wait to see my other children to decide what to do with my life."

[From the Rhodesian Financial Gazette, July 14, 1978]

CHANCES OF CEASEFIRE DIE AS TERROR ACTS CONTINUE

Most observers now believe that the chances of a ceasefire being achieved by representatives of the internal parties are becoming increasingly remote. Virtually every political pronouncement by those claiming to have control of the terrorist forces have been met with further acts of violence.

The UANC recently sent four envoys into the Fort Victoria district: they were murdered. A similar fate is said to have befallen emissaries from Mr. Sithole's ZANU, sent to negotiate with groups loyal to Mugabe's ZANLA.

Recruits are still said by ZAPU to be leaving Rhodesia via Botswana to join Mr. Nkomo's Zambia-based ZIPRA which, with the aid of Cuban training, appears to be intensifying its efforts along the Northern border and in the South West—an area that was, apparently, relatively quiet until recently.

Mr. Nkomo has repeatedly commented in recent weeks that he plans an intensification of the war, with an increasing concentration on urban targets. Although efforts to mount concentrated campaigns in major urban centres appear to be unlikely to materialise in view of the stringent security arrangements in force, an increased effort in the rural areas is felt probable.

Experienced observers now believe that, in the absence of a negotiated ceasefire at an all-party conference—a possibility they consider remote—the future reduction in the level of terrorist activity will be due more to the continued efforts of the Security Forces than to any response to calls from Executive Council members.

In spite of a casualty toll that has risen sharply since the signing of the Salisbury Agreement on March 3rd, Mr. Sithole's ZANU maintains that the terror war "is dying down".

"We do not think it—we know it" said a spokesman. Asked why ZANU's predictions of a ceasefire had not materialised, the spokesman said that recent intensified attacks on civilians were "the work of isolated dissidents trying to wreck the Salisbury Agreement."

The ZANU attitude contrasts with that of Prime Minister Ian Smith, who a few weeks ago commented that the ceasefire "was not going as well as we had hoped"; in an interview with the Sunday Express this week he said that "the killing, the maiming, the torture and the rape will continue and possibly increase in intensity as the British government continues to sit on the fence in true Munich fashion."

And this week's attack on the Kariba-Elephant Walk convoy was said by one of those present to be "well planned and executed" and not, apparently, the work of an untrained and poorly armed force.

Anger over this and other recent incidents is known to be growing among both civilians and military personnel.

Furthermore, although ZANU has also repeatedly claimed that the "safe return" arrangement is creating a flow of returning terrorists, they are not believed to come from the main body of either ZIPRA or ZANLA.

However, recent reports of internal disagreement in Mugabe's ZANU/ZANLA may indicate that the main offensive is passing to Mr. Nkomo.

Mr. GARN. In an interview by the London newspaper, the Times on May 22, 1978, Andrew Young responded to a question on the Patriotic Front by saying:

Non-violence is in many ways being practiced by the Patriotic Front. . . . I asked one of their commanders, Tongogara, what they actually do in Rhodesia, and he said they're not doing much fighting, except when they are fired upon, or when the Rhodesian forces find them and try to run them out. Basically, what they're doing is moving around the villages and conducting political seminars and singing songs.

Ambassador Young's reference was to Josiah Tongogara who is ZANU leader Robert Mugabe's "Secretary for Defense." Following the murder in Lusaka in March 1975, of Herbert Chitepo, a leading member of ZANU, an International Commission of Enquiry was established by the Zambian Government to investigate the murder. The commission's report concluded that Tongogara, and others, had been responsible for the murder. The report made the following remarks about Tongogara:

There was evidence before the Commission that Tongogara had openly remarked that he saw no reason why he should not be the first President in an independent Zimbabwe through the barrel of a gun.

Robert Mugabe, the leader of the other faction of the Patriotic Front, ZANU, holds six university degrees, three of which were obtained while he was in detention in Rhodesia. Mugabe, an avowed Marxist who is ideologically incapable of compromise, is on record as having said that he wants a one-party Marxist state in Rhodesia. As quoted in the Rhodesia Herald in April of this year, Mugabe said:

We have a duty before us to prosecute the war to the finish. We are fighting because we want to spill the blood of the people, not because we are bloodthirsty, not because we like suffering, but because we want peace.

The Times of London reported that when questioning Andrew Young on Mugabe, Young was asked did he find a tension between himself and Mugabe because of a difference in attitudes and methods. Ambassador Young is reported to have replied:

Not at all. I find that I'm fascinated by his intelligence, by his dedication. The only thing that frustrates me about Robert Mugabe is that he is so damned incorruptible. He's inflexible. It's very difficult for him to make those practical political compromises that frankly I would like to see in the interest of a settlement. . . . He's a very gentle man. In fact, one of the ironies of the whole struggle is that I can't imagine Joshua Nkomo, or Robert Mugabe ever pulling the trigger on a gun to kill anyone. I doubt they ever have.

Mr. President, in a recent interview with the British News of the World, Robert Mugabe stated that the Smith regime must be crushed, destroyed, and overthrown if necessary. I recommend this article to my distinguished colleagues in order to provide important insight on this Communist leader and his solution on the Rhodesian settlement.

The article follows:

"THE BLACK-HITLER" STATES HIS AIMS IN BRITISH PAPER

The Executive Council brought to trial as traitors and criminals . . . the Smith regime crushed and destroyed . . . a one-party Marxist-Leninist State of Zimbabwe. This is the immediate plan of action of Patriotic Front leader Mr. Robert Mugabe should he come to power. In an interview with the British News of the World, appearing under the bold black headline "The Black Hitler", Mr. Mugabe puts the trial of Bishop Abel Muzorewa, tho Rev. Ndabaningi Sithole and Senator Chief Chirau first on his list of demands.

"They must be brought to trial. If the judgment is that they hang, then hang they will.

"We have appealed to Muzorewa, Sithole and Chirau to retract. If they do not they will be overthrown.

"They will become enemies of the people. They would be tried for atrocities. They have become Mr. Smith's accomplices."

Mr. Mugabe denied he was fighting a racialist war. It was a war for freedom. Once it was over white Rhodesians would be welcome to stay to take part in the economic and political life of the country.

"UNJUST"

"Once the present system is overthrown anybody at all, regardless of colour, race or creed, will be free to stay in the country as long as they comply with the rules set by the State and government of the day."

Mr. Mugabe emphasised that while there would be no seizure of personal property, nationalisation of industry and land would be a major factor in the destruction of the capitalist system and the implementation of a socialist system.

"At the moment the majority have very little land on which they eke out an existence. The minority has more land than they require. That is unjust. It must be corrected."

White settlers would be "freed" from the concept that they were superior merely because they were white.

"We will teach the whites that it is wrong for them to seek a privileged position. They will undergo a psychological reconditioning."

Mr. Mugabe said ZANU was anxious to have further talks with the British Government and was pressing for a constitutional conference to be held.

Previous attempts to get agreement and an end to the bloodshed had failed because Britain could not bring herself to proceed without Mr. Smith accepting any agreement.

He rejected any part of the internal agreement.

"We want genuine independence, not some phoney neo-colonial stuff. Total power to the people. That means unrestricted political sovereignty for our Government and State plus the military instruments that go with it.

"In short it is not just a majority in Parliament that we want but also the acceptance of our armed forces as the forces of our country.

"If these two are acceptable then we will proceed to elections."

Mr. GARN. Finally, Mr. President, since the earliest permanent residents of Rhodesia were missionaries and clergy, it is significant that the lives of these people were respected by the most warlike people. But now the terrorists of the Patriotic Front find the clergy a vulnerable target and irresistible prey for their well-armed cowards.

Prior to the killing of any Rhodesian missionaries there were isolated instances of individual terrorist leaders demonstrating antireligion views. A piece of rhetoric left at the scene of an unsuccessful bridge demolition in June of 1977 closed with the words "down with Christ."

Other missionaries were told by terrorists not to mention Christ and His resurrection in the course of preaching. It has been pointed out that this restriction is ominously akin to similar impositions made upon the Russian churches. In another incident, the Roman Catholic Church was described as representing the evils of capitalism.

The deliberate selection of missionaries as targets may have many origins, but the availability of defenseless victims in remote areas, and therefore, the susceptibility to murder, rape, and extreme brutality of the most vicious kind imaginable is significant. Tragically, these clergymen have persisted against the cowardice of the so-called Freedom Fighters of the Patriotic Front, but not without paying a significant price. In a recent article in the June 30, 1978, of the To the Point International, the bloodthirsty savagery of Robert Mugabe's forces against undefended missionaries was tragically highlighted.

This article follows:

MUGABE'S MEN MASSACRE MISSION WHITES

The massacre and mutilation of 12 British white missionary men, women and children in Rhodesia last week tragically highlighted failure of the Rhodesian transitional government to stop the terrorist war which has ravaged the country for the past six years. It also brought home to the whites in Rhodesia that even those carrying the word of God are not immune to attack from those whose cause many of them support.

For nine adults and four children, the daily threats of sudden death became a reality as a party of guerrillas reportedly from the Zimbabwe African National Liberation Army (ZANLA) of Robert Mugabe's Zimbabwe African National Union (ZANU) herded them from their mission school 25kms outside of Rhodesia's fourth largest city Umtali. Only one, Mary Fisher, escaped, and she is critically injured in Salisbury's Andrew Fleming Hospital.

The full horror of the brutal murders at the Elim Pentecostal Mission nestling in the often mist-shrouded Vumba mountains—Rhodesia's tourist paradise—became apparent only as on the spot investigations began.

A To The Point correspondent flew to the scene and saw for himself the pathetic evidence of the final struggle for life by the 12. Some had raised their arms to defend themselves from axes and bayonets. Joyce Lynn beaten to death, lay with her three-week-old baby Pamela. Their arms were stretched out to each other, their fingers centimetres apart. The mother had squeezed one hand tightly around her wedding ring as she reached for her baby in her dying moments.

The victims were beyond help when found by the Rhodesian security forces. Axe wounds scarred their bodies, bayonet thrusts were deep into their backs and skulls crushed by lengths of thick wood. One man had his hands tied behind his back and one woman an axe still embedded in her neck. All five women had been sexually assaulted. All the dead children were under five years old, near the bodies were blood-covered lengths of rough wood which the guerrillas had used to bludgeon their victims to death.

Shocked black and white Rhodesian troops carried the bodies away, tears in their eyes.

Students at the mission school said that while the killings were taking place another group of guerrillas, who identified themselves as members of ZANLA, rounded them up and ordered them to the dormitories. "They said they were from ZANLA," said William Shayangwako, 17. Black staff members at the school, who were not injured, said that the guerrillas denounced the Rhodesian internal settlement and singled out for criticism the Reverend Ndabaningi Sithole, who disputes the leadership of ZANU and ZANLA with Mugabe. (See interview).

Speaking to To the Points Barry Baxter by telephone from Maputo, Mugabe's aides denied that ZANU was responsible for the killings.

"It is the work of those three fear-ridden puppets, Muzorewa, Sithole and (Senator Chief Jeremiah) Chirau; and Rhodesian Prime Minister Ian Smith," ZANU lieutenant Charles Ndhlovu told Baxter. "They seem to have a new extended licence to embark on a bloody terrorist rampage. Hundreds of innocent civilians have been massacred by them and their (Rhodesian) forces.

"On Thursday last week (the day before the massacres) the Salisbury regime's troops unleashed an unprovoked murderous assault upon civilian workers at an agricultural station in Mocambique. Seventeen people including two Belgian nationals were killed.

"Then, to cover their own bloody footprints as they realised the eyes of the world were upon them, they once again let loose their soldiers and had the 12 British people assassinated."

There were few takers for Ndhlovu's stand. Already many white missionaries in Rhodesia have been forced to take up arms to defend themselves against what they consider a Marxist onslaught against Christianity by Mugabe, "It's a war for hearts and minds," one told To The Point. But an increasing number of missionaries feel they are left with no choice but to pack their Bibles and pull out—and leave thousands of black children without education and black peasants without medical care.

Smith initially refused to comment when Baxter telephoned him from Johannesburg. Later a spokesman for the Rhodesian government declared that it was not so much a need for condolences for the relatives of the massacred 12 whites—it was too late for that—but to ask if Britain and the U.S. still expected Rhodesia to negotiate with the people responsible for the outrage.

Commented a white woman in Salisbury: "It's disgusting . . . and these are the people Owen and Young want to let rule us."

Mr. GARN. The intensification of pursuing the elimination of religious conviction was recently told by Bishop Paul Burrough as reported by the London Bureau of the Sunday Mail on July 16, 1978:

BURN BIBLES, CLERGY TOLD

African clergymen in a large part of the Diocese of Mashonaland have been told by terrorists to burn their Bibles and this is driving them underground.

This was revealed when their bishop, the Rt. Rev. Paul Burrough spoke to a congregation at Ripley Parish Church, Surrey.

He said the ruling applied mostly in the border areas between Rhodesia and Zambia and Mozambique where missionaries and their congregations lived in fear of their lives from marauding terrorists.

The bishop, here for the Anglican Lambeth conference which is due to take place at the end of the month, said there was a campaign of persecution of Christians in these areas and the Roman Catholic Church, which had the greatest number of converts in the area, was also being forced to take similar measures.

Some missions and schools in the more sensitive areas had been forced to close down, he said.

The bishop said that members of congregations in his diocese were determined to keep their faith.

"Some have walked more than 60 km to receive confirmation under a tree. Then they received holy communion."

After that, the bishop had told them that from then on, they could only expect to make spiritual communion.

The persecution of Christians, he told his listeners, was a "necessary precursor of the establishment of a Marxist state" but it was only in the most extreme cases that people had been told to go underground and burn their Bibles.

He traced the history of Rhodesia from the beginning of the century when the first whites had settled there and explained what the settlers had tried to do and how the "present tragic situation" had arisen.

He could no longer enter a large part of his diocese. This situation had arisen over the past 12 months, he said.

Bishop Burrough spoke at the church where his father had been vicar between 1911 and 1917.

While the Carter administration pays lip service to the fact that Soviet activities in Africa appear to be directed toward exploiting some of that continent's difficulties, it is ironic that the Communist-backed Patriotic Front is encouraged by this administration to reject an agreement worked out in Rhodesia by leaders of all races in that country. There is little doubt that the violent hostility of the Patriotic Front to the internal settlement proved that neither Nkomo nor Mugabe are really motivated by the democratic ideals they proclaim, but merely by their personal ambitions to seize total power through the barrel of a gun.●

OPEN LETTER TO ANATOLY SCHARANSKY

● Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, we are all painfully aware of the great injustice which has resulted in the imprisonment of Anatoly Scharansky. It is especially unfortunate that one part of the "evidence" which Soviet authorities presented at Scharansky's trial to support the charge of "anti-Soviet agitation" was the fact that he met with a delegation of U.S. Senators visiting Moscow in 1975. I was a member of that delegation.

Last week, together with Senators ROBERT BYRD, BAKER, and JAVITS, I had the privilege of sponsoring a reception for Anatoly Scharansky's courageous wife, Avital Scharansky. At the reception, I had a long discussion with her about what could be done to help her husband. I informed her of the circumstances surrounding the meeting of U.S. Senators with dissidents in Moscow in 1975.

The meeting was attended by eight U.S. Senators and 18 Soviet dissidents. Anatoly Scharansky was at the meeting. There was, however, nothing secretive about the meeting.

It was planned before we left Washington. Soviet authorities knew in advance that the meeting would take place. The meeting was held in a suite in the Hotel Rossiya. Neither the fact of the meeting nor the substance of what was discussed was secret.

I told Mrs. Scharansky when she was here that I would write an open letter to her husband publicly stating for the record the facts surrounding that meeting.

I have today written such a letter which has been cosigned by each of the eight Senators who attended the meeting in qeustion. It is our hope that Soviet authorities will reconsider their actions in the Scharansky case and permit him to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD the open letter to Anatoly Scharansky.

COMMITTEE ON GOVERNMENTAL AFFAIRS,
Washington, D.C., July 26, 1978.

DEAR MR. SCHARANSKY: Your trial and imprisonment are of great concern to many Americans. The denial of your freedom is an affront shared by free people everywhere.

We are writing to you as members of the Senate delegation which met with you on June 29, 1975. We were pleased to have the opportunity to meet many citizens of the Soviet Union including yourself, exchange views, and have a discussion as American legislators do regularly all over the world. We were outraged that the Soviet authorities used the fact that we met with you as "evidence" to support the charge of "anti-Soviet agitation." We are writing to state for the record the nature of our meeting and to affirm that it was our privilege to have met with you.

The meeting took place at the request of Senators Ribicoff and Javits on June 29, 1975, in the Rossiya Hotel in Moscow with an official Senate delegation. The Soviet authorities knew in advance that this meeting would take place openly in a Moscow hotel suite. Neither the fact of the meeting nor its substance were secret.

Members of the Senate delegation and a number of activists in the Soviet Jewish community attended the meeting. We discussed how to assist Soviet Jews who desired to emigrate from the Soviet Union. A detailed summary of the meeting was published as part of the official report the delegation filed with the Senate. That summary is attached to this letter.

The use of such an open meeting which took place three years ago as evidence against you of criminal conduct is tragic and unjustified. We shall continue to urge Soviet authorities to reconsider their actions in your case and permit you to emigrate from the Soviet Union.

Sincerely,

ABE RIBICOFF, ROBERT MORGAN, GARY HART, PATRICK J. LEAHY, JACOB K. JAVITS, CHARLES H. PERCY, CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, and PETE V. DOMENICI, U.S. Senators.

Attachment.

[Excerpt from Report of a Conference Between Members of the U.S. Senate and Delegates to the Supreme Soviet of the Soviet Union]

G. SUMMARY OF THE DISCUSSION AT A MEETING BETWEEN MEMBERS OF THE SENATE DELEGATION AND SOVIET JEWISH ACTIVISTS

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION, MEETING OF SOVIET JEWISH ACTIVITIES WITH U.S. SENATE DELEGATION

Participants

Jewish Activists.—Anatoly Scharansky, Lev Ovsischez, Alexander Lunts, Efim Davidovich, Elias Essas, Vladimir Slepak, Dina Beylina, Vladimer Prestin, Prof. Benjamin Levich, Vitaly Rubin, Ida Nudel, Alexander Lerner, Vladimir Lasaris, Benjamin Fain, Victor Brailovsky, Pavel Abramovich, Mark Azbel, and Mrs. Levich.

Senators.—Senator Javits, Senator Ribicoff, Senator Humphrey, Senator Scott, Senator Percy, Senator Mathias, Senator Morgan, Senator Leahy, Senator Hart, and Senator Domenici.

Others.—Peter Lakeland (Sen. Javits), Ken Davis (Sen. Scott), Scott Cohen (Sen. Percy , Al Saunders (Sen. Humphrey), Mrs. Javits, and Mrs. Ribicoff.

Place.—Rossiya Hotel, Moscow.

Date.—June 29, 1975.

Senator Javits opened the meeting by explaining the nature and purpose of the visit of the Senate delegation to the USSR and introduced individual members of the delegation present at the meeting. He emphasized the interest of the individual Senators in the cause of the Jewish activists and other dissidents in the Soviet Union who were making a stand on moral grounds in support of basic human rights and dignity. He explained that the group, by its nature was not on a negotiating mission, negotiations being the exclusive prerogative of the Executive Branch. Nonetheless, the Senate Delegation had official status from both the American and Soviet points of view. In this connection, no statement would be issued respecting the meeting with the activists while the delegation was in the USSR, but the exchange of views with them would be most valuable for the official discussions to follow with the Soviets and would be most valuable with respect to any follow-up actions that might ensue upon the return of the delegation to the United States

Senator Ribicoff joined Senator Javits in welcoming the activists, assured them of the sympathy and knowledge of the delegation members respecting their plight. He stressed the potential usefulness of the discussion being commenced and asked the dissidents to be free and frank in expressing any advice they had for the Senators.

Senator Scott joined in greeting the activists and assured them that their views would be conveyed to all members of the delegation. He said that what the activists had to say would be very important to members of the delegation and that the Senators wanted to hear the views of the activists first-hand. He said that a serious deadlock had now developed respecting trade and emigration and that President Ford, just before the Delegation's departure, had written to the Chairman and Ranking Members of the Senate, and House Banking Committees, the House Ways and Means Committee and the Senate Finance Committee requesting that they explore ways to reopen the emigration question and see if some new legislative flexibility may be possible to help break the deadlock.

Senator Mathias said that the members of the delegation want to hear from the activists; the Senators know some part of their struggle and their coming to meet with the activists was evidence of their deep personal concern.

Prof. Lerner expressed the thanks of the activists to the Senators and to the U.S. Congress for the Jackson amendment which he characterized as "tremendous work". He wishes to dispel any idea that such activity by the Congress could bring harm to the activist of their movement. "We think we have benefited; one hundred thousand Jews have been able to leave for Israel as a result of the Jackson amendment struggle and many more will leave. We are grateful to the Senators, the U.S. Congress and the American people who have sacrificed their own material interests in support of their concern for our plight. We are deeply moved."

Senator Scott said that the Soviets state that the decline in emigration is due to a decline in applications. Is this so, or is it due to harassment?

Prof. Lerner said that they brought a letter with them addressed to the Senators describing what has happened since enactment of the Jackson amendment.

Senator Javits said that he had the letter and would circulate a copy to all members of the delegation. (Text of the letter is attached.)

An activist said that the KGB is trying to destroy the dissident movement in two ways: a) by harassment of the 'refuseniks' and b) by intimidation of potential applicants for permission to emigrate. He said there had been an increase in anti-Semetic propaganda and noted a recent article published which attempted to justify the programs of Czarist days.

Senator Ribicoff said "Let's talk conclusory realities; some say the Jackson amendment has hurt. What is your view?"

Dr. Lasaris said that pursuant to the understandings reached in the Fall of 1974 Soviets were supposed to allow Jews to emigrate but instead they have entered a campaign of repression. After the Stevenson amendment, the campaign of repression became more forceful and more open. The campaign begun in the provinces against Jews reached Moscow. The campaign became more systematic, the methods of refusal, discouragement and harassment became more open and more coordinated. He said that this was not due to the Jackson amendment but due to the Stevenson amendment which caused the Soviets to break the agreements they had entered into in the Fall of 1974.

Prof. Lerner said that the Jackson amendment has been helpful. It was the Stevenson amendment which turned the Soviets off on the compromise agreement.

Senator Scott said that at his request, President Ford has writen a letter asking the Chairman and Ranking Minority Members of the four involved committees of the Senate and House to reexamine the legislative restrictions concerning Export-Import Bank Credits for the Soviet Union, as effected by the Stevenson amendment and the Jackson amendment. He was hopeful that something would be done on the credit issue which might also be helpful on the emigration question.

Prof. Lerner said that the fact of the Jackson amendment compromise which the Soviets had agreed to proved that the Soviets were willing to accept the Jackson amendment.

Mr. Fain said that the worsening of the situation for Soviet Jews was due to the Stevenson amendment limits on credits. This led to more severe harassment by the KGB.

Mr. Davidovich said the Jackson amendment had been a very positive development for Soviet Jews. They had benefited from it. He said the main principles for the activities were (a) a close connection between Jewish emigration and foreign policy cooperation by the U.S. such as trade with the USSR; and (b) the presence of a juridical obligation on the part of the Soviets on emigration policies and procedures, tied to trade benefits sought by the USSR. He said ideology and prestige are especially important to the USSR. A way out of the present situation of stalemate will be easier if the two principles he mentioned are adhered to. There should be a way out for the Soviets to save face. Let the Soviets know that they can gain, or lose, on such matters as trade, credit, scientific exchanges and technical cooperation. The objectives of the principles he mentioned could be gained not only through state to state agreements, but also by the attitudes of individual scientists in the U.S. who are being asked to engage in scientific and technical exchanges. Such individuals in the U.S. and the West can convey the principles, and the advantages and disadvantages entailed, to Soviet scientists who desire cooperation and this can help the pressure through official government channels.

Senator Javits said he had been personally involved in the negotiations of the Jackson amendment compromise and wished to point out that the Soviets had never promised a figure or a quota of persons who would be permitted to leave. In the exchange of letters between Senator Jackson and Secretary Kissinger, the Congress told the U.S. President that it would expect an emigration rate of 60,000. But, the Soviets never promised any figure and therefore never broke any promise in that regard. He then asked whether the activists felt that Soviet dignity must be maintained to get a resolution of the stalemate. (They answered in the affirmative.) He asked whether they felt that it would be necessary for the Soviets to get some benefit out of the agreement. (They answered in the affirmative.)

Prof. Levich said the important question was what should be done after the compromise agreement on the Jackson amendment was broken by the Soviets. The more timid Jews had stopped and are now watching to see what happens. The KGB is carrying on a big campaign of intimidation. Many letters are being circulated by the authorities from Jews who emigrated to Israel and are having some difficulties in adjusting. He said that he agrees that it is impossible to have some piece of paper that is only for Jews. The most important emigration issue he feels is the "government clearance" requirement. This has a very hard effect on intellectuals. Every intellectual, every educated person needs to get a clearance sometime. A clearance is required for instance, just to do research in the library. Every educated person learns some "secrets" sometime in his career. There must be some agreement on the clearance requirement; since clearances are indispensable for all intellectuals, the emigration of intellectuals is made more difficult by the Soviet refusal of emigration permission to persons who have clearances. There must be some formal agreement on the clearance question.

Senator Humphrey said that he would be most interested to learn the views of the activists as how to satisfy Soviet pride which has been wounded by the Jackson amendment, and how to get some emigration results. The present situation is one of stalemate with emigration down and the Soviet's feelings wounded. Is some revision of the Jackson amendment legislation required to break the stalemate? Soviet officials constantly say the Jackson amendment is unacceptable as explained publicly by Senator Jackson in his press conference. He asked whether the same results might be achieved by some modification or revision of the present law. Would it be possible to use language which ties MFN and credits to observation of the Declaration on Human Rights, which the USSR had signed, if combined with a monitoring device by Congress to assure actual and continuing compliance? He said the Senators needed practical suggestions. The Senators could leave the Soviet Union saying the Jackson amendment should remain as is; is there something else they should be saying? We, as Senators are interested in how best we can help human rights and Jewish emigration.

Dr. Slepak said the Jackson amendment showed that the Soviets are ready to compromise. But after the passage of the Stevenson amendment the Soviets couldn't say that $300 million was too little in exchange for the Jews. Thus, they have maintained officially that the Jackson amendment is the reason for breaking the trade agreement. However, the activists think it was the Stevenson amendment which caused the Soviets to break the trade agreement. Now after, stating this officially so many times, the Soviet government cannot retreat without some modification of the Jackson amendment.

Senator Percy said he had made a specific suggestion to the Soviets. He proposed that in the delegation's meetings with their Soviet counterparts that it could be put forward that emigration in 1975 should equal the 1973 figure of 33,000 and that the Soviets be told that the trend established in 1971–73 be reestablished and maintained. The U.S. is interested in action, not words. If the Soviets keep to their policy of 1971 to 1973, the U.S. can change the Jackson amendment.

Mr. Brailovsky said that acceptance of such a proposal by the Soviets could be dangerous to the activists because it would allow the Soviets to choose who is allowed to go with no objective criteria covering emigration principles. This would allow the KGB too much room to operate against individuals. The activists would have no objective criteria to appeal to.

Senator Percy asked if the same objection would remain if the percentage of Jews among those permitted to emigrate would have to be maintained.

Mr. Brailovsky said that would not solve the problem because the KGB could block the emigration of all intellectuals.

Senator Javits said that the Senate delegation could not negotiate an agreement with the Soviets on these matters. Only the President and Secretary of State can negotiate on behalf of the United States.

Senator Humphrey noted that the Soviet Union was a signatory to the Declaration on Human Rights. He suggested that perhaps the Jackson amendment could be modified to say that the United States would extend MFN and credits to all nations which are signatories to the Human Rights Convention, with a requirement that the President must certify annually that nations receiving MFN and credits under this provision are fulfilling their obligations under the Convention.

Several activists commented that this was an excellent suggestion.

An activist pointed that the Declaration of Human Rights was only a statement of intent and was not obligatory in the Soviet Union. He stressed the importance of linking MFN and credits to provisions of Soviet law that are binding. He said that an important aspect of the present situation is that Soviet laws are not being observed by the Soviet authorities. The Jackson amendment does not contradict the various present laws of the USSR. Much of the present campaign against Jewish activists is in violation of present Soviet laws. Nobody is holding the KGB to account for its violations. He noted the viciousness of some current propaganda which alleges that Zionist ideas influenced Hitler, who got his idea of being Fuhrer from Herzl. Therefore, it is said in propaganda, all Jews applying for emigration are Zionists and are breaking Soviet law by encouraging ideas used by Hitler.

Senator Ribicoff said that no solution to the problem could be settled in this meeting. However, it will be very useful to get the ideas of the activists and their suggestions. He plans to tell the Soviets that under the U.S. Constitution, the Congress has authority over trade agreements. All the Senators present at this meeting are in full sympathy with the activists.

Alexander Lunts commenting on Senator Percy's suggestion said that it isn't just a question of the rate of emigration. Discussion of numbers per se can be set aside. Three things are needed: a) no harassment or intimidation on applicants for emigration; b) no arbitrary refusals of applications, 'ungrounded' in law; c) emigration permission should be granted first to 'refuseniks' who had been denied emigration arbitrarily and 'groundlessly" and to 'prisoners of Zion.' An agreement with the Soviets on these three principles would be enough. The agreement must have provisions for violations.

Prof. Levich said we are not politicians and it is hard for us to give precise answers to politicians' questions, but we will try. The starting point for an agreement with the Soviets on the 'essence of the problems' should cover all points mentioned in the discussion. He doubted that any such agreement would be published by the Soviets in any form in the USSR. Therefore, it would lack status and legal prestige. In any written agreement, the main point should be the Declaration of Human Rights, suggested by Senator Humphrey. The Declaration is not a law, but there could be an agreement between the U.S. and the USSR to fulfill or implement the moral obligations of the Declaration. That would be very important. The U.S. Congress would have the responsibility to decide whether there was conformity and to monitor compliance by the USSR.

Senator Leahy said he has talked with some of the activists present on other occasions over the phone. He emphasized that basic human rights transcend any single ethic group and stressed that he was very devoted to their cause although he is not personally Jewish and he has a very tiny percentage of Jews among his constituents.

Senator Hart said he agreed with what Senator Ribicoff had expressed very well. In the U.S., Jews and non-Jews both are very concerned with the basic human rights issue. We will do all we can to help you.

Senator Morgan said that the people of North Carolina know of the plight of the activists and are very concerned. The Jewish community in North Carolina is not very large, but has been active in making everyone aware of the problem and getting their sympathy and support. As a new Senator, he would look for guidance in handling this problem from Senators Humphrey, Javits and Ribicoff.

Senator Javits summed up the discussion to this point. We have come as Senators and as friends of human rights from the freest country in the world to hear from you what we can do to advance human rights here. We have given some of our individual ideas frankly to you to see if they would fit into your situation. But, they are only ideas not negotiations. We appreciate receiving your views and suggestions. He asked if their views could be summarized as follows: a) the Jackson amendment gave hope and brought results in getting 100,000 Jews out of Russia; b) there has been a serious deterioration in the situation since the breakdown of the Trade Agreement; c) the dignity of the Soviet Union must be preserved in any solution; d) a new solution should concentrate not on numbers but on rights. The obligations under the Declaration of Human Rights, and existing Soviet law, are two starting points; e) the importance of timely action to resolve the stalemate is implied from the discussion.

Senator Ribicoff added that it seems to be the view of the group that it was the Stevenson amendment, not the Jackson amendment that caused the breakdown of the Trade Agreement.

Mrs. Levich said the importance of the concern of Congress and individual Senators should be included in any summary of the discussion.

Several Activists reiterated that the essence of the Jackson amendment should be preserved. Congress must retain a mechanism for monitoring and control because Soviet practice and Soviet words are often not the same. An example was given of amnesty and release from prison for war veterans, in connection with the twenty-fifth anniversary of the victory over Hitler, being denied to a Jewish activist. Under the regulations he is entitled to amnesty and release from prison but, it is not being accorded. A number of individual cases for presentation to Soviet authorities are contained in written material presented to the Senators at the outset of the meeting.

Prof. Lerner said we have placed a hard responsibility on the U.S. Senate and the American People for the fate of Soviet Jewry. We are profoundly grateful to them for assuming the burden of our fate. We trust our fate to your true hands. But for this support, many of us would not be here this evening, but rather would be in camps and prisons at this moment. We shall do our part in this struggle. We know the Americans help those who help themselves.

Senator Javits replied by saying the Senators understand and appreciate the courage shown by the activists, including the courage required to come to the meeting tonight.

Senator Humphrey said the presence of the activists and the presence of the Senators was the most important thing. Both the U.S. and the Soviet authorities know we are here and that you are here with us. We are all strong supporters of civil rights and human rights. It is important to get your counsel.

Dr. Slepak closed the meeting by thanking the Senators on behalf of all those present and on behalf of those they represent. He asked that the Senators please tell all their colleagues in the Congress about the meeting this evening.●

THE NEED FOR COMPREHENSIVE LEGISLATION AS A RESPONSE TO ZURCHER VERSUS STANFORD DAILY

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, some time ago, the Supreme Court handed down its decision in the case of Zurcher against Stanford Daily. In that opinion the Court stated that the Government could forcibly and without notice search a person's home or business for evidence of a crime even if that person is in no way suspected of criminal activity.

While we would all agree that prosecutors should have access to evidence of criminal activity, I cannot agree that this is an appropriate standard for gaining evidence which happens to be in the possession of innocent Americans. Moreover, the practice of surprise police searches would pose a particular problem to the first amendment functions of the news media. As we all know, part of their task in our society is to uncover and report on criminal activity whether it is being committed by governmental officials or private citizens. In the course of this work, therefore, a newsroom would almost routinely be in the possession of some type of "evidence" of criminal activity.

Mr. President, as a response to the need created by Stanford Daily, I introduced the Citizens Privacy Protection Amendment of 1978 (S. 3164). This bill would allow the police to gain access to evidence through a subpena rather than through a surprise search when the evidence is in the possession of an innocent party. The bill contains an exception to the subpena requirement if there is probable cause to believe the evidence would be destroyed.

One of the important features of the citizens privacy protection amendment is that it applies to Federal, State, and local officials. As chairman of the Subcommittee on the Constitution, I have held 2 days of hearings on this legislation and received testimony from a variety of sources. It is interesting to note, however, that a significant number of associations and organizations which have testified have endorsed the comprehensive approach of S. 3164. They include the American Civil Liberties Union, the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, the American Society of Newspaper Editors, the American Newspaper Publishers Association, the Radio and Television News Directors Association, and the Society of Professional Journalists Sigma Delta Chi Freedom of Information Committee.

Mr. President, if we do not have an approach that applies equally to Federal, State, and local authorities we will very likely find ourselves in the situation described in a recent article in the New York Times. If Federal and State authorities adopt different standards citizens will of necessity be forced to accept the set of standards which afford the least privacy. It will do little good for one governmental entity to adopt strict standards if another entity with concurrent jurisdiction has less stringent ones. It is of little consequence to a citizen or a news reporter if the police searching your home or office happens to carry a Federal or State badge.

Mr. President, I would like to have printed in the RECORD a copy of the New York Times story.

The story follows:

[From the New York Times, July 24, 1978]

CONNECTICUT AND UNITED STATES DIFFER ON NEWSPAPER SEARCH

(By Robert E. Tomasson)

STAMFORD, CONN.—In the wake of the United States Supreme Court ruling that newspapers may be searched for evidence of a crime without warning, Federal and state officials in Connecticut have adopted strikingly different guidelines governing such searches.

While the United States Attorney for Connecticut has established procedures for his staff that all but exclude such unannounced searches, the chief state's attorney has told his assistants that such searches would not be discouraged.

The divergent Federal and state procedures went into effect as the Department of Justice was preparing guidelines for all Federal prosecutors following the May 31 court ruling that news organizations, like other groups and individuals, were not entitled to prior notice of a search or to an opportunity to contest such a search before it occurred.

The Federal guidelines, set by Richard Blumenthal, the United States Attorney in Connecticut, are the only ones set by a United States Attorney on his own volition, according to a spokesman for the Justice Department. And while the guidelines were reviewed by "the highest officials" of the department, there was no other indication that Mr. Blumenthal's rules were a preview of the forthcoming guidelines from Washington.

Barring new Federal legislation, however, the 50 state prosecutors are expected to go their own way in setting search guidelines in state investigations.

SEVEN CONDITIONS FOR SEARCHES

Mr. Blumenthal's guidelines included the following conditions to be met before seeking a Federal warrant to search a news organization:

"All reasonable attempts" must be made to obtain information from nonmedia sources.

"Vigorous efforts" including "negotiations" must be made to obtain voluntary disclosure from news organizations.

"If negotiations fail," any warrant must be approved by Mr. Blumenthal, who would seek "express authorization" from the Attorney General of the United States.

There must be reasonable grounds for believing that evidence of a crime was in jeopardy of being destroyed.

The evidence sought must be essential to "a successful investigation, particularly with reference to directly establishing guilt or innocence."

There must be reasonable grounds from nonmedia sources for believing that "a crime has actually occurred."

In the event a search is made, the news personnel must be permitted to make copies of any documents seized.

In a memo to his assistant attorneys, Mr. Blumenthal said that unless such searches were strongly curtailed, if not barred, "the fear of such searches may deter or dry up reporters' confidential sources, create reluctance to preserve notes and other materials . . . and interfere in numerous other ways with legitimate activities of the press."

DIFFERENT APPROACH BY THE STATE

Joseph T. Gormley Jr., the chief state's attorney, said in a statement that while guidelines were necessary, "they should not be construed to govern or discourage the use of valid search warrants to discover contraband, fruits and instrumentalities of crime or other evidence of crime that may have been purposefully or unintentionally left in the possession of someone not involved in the criminal activity."

In setting the Federal guidelines, Mr. Blumenthal cited a section of the recent court ruling that "where presumptively protective materials are sought to be seized, the warrant requirement should be administered to leave as little possible to the direction or whim of the officer in the field."

Mr. Gormley said in setting guidelines for state law-enforcement officers that the court ruling "fully supports the search of news media organizations under Fourth Amendment safeguards."

Mr. Blumenthal gave a strong indication that he foresaw no circumstances in which Federal agents would search a news office unannounced. Mr. Gormley, on the other hand, indicated that he would approve such searches if they were considered relevant to a criminal investigation.

And while Mr. Blumenthal said that he would have to personally approve requests for the search warrants, Mr. Gormley left it up to the discretion of the chief prosecutors in the state's 11 judicial districts.

STATE AND U.S. ATTORNEYS CONFER

At a meeting last week with Mr. Gormley and the various chief prosecutors in the state, Mr. Blumenthal urged that his guidelines be applied to state searches.

According to one participant in the meeting, the state prosecutors expressed concern about being "bulldozed" into setting limitations on an investigative tool that had been sanctioned by the Supreme Court.

While adopting some of the milder Federal guidelines, the state prosecutors rejected the two main recommendations, while others were altered.

In adapting the Federal rule that "a search warrant should not be used to obtain peripheral, non-essential or speculative information," the words "peripheral" and "speculative" were dropped from the state's guideline.

There have been indications that Mr. Blumenthal and Mr. Gormley have had a cool professional relationship.

Mr. Blumenthal, a former reporter for The Washington Post, is investigating municipal corruption in the Stamford area after Mr. Gormley had declined to investigate some aspects of the alleged corruption.

Much of the Federal investigation has been based on information from anonymous sources supplied by a reporter for a local newspaper.●

IAM AND THE GUIDING EYES

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, this year the International Association of Machinists & Aerospace Workers celebrated its 90th anniversary in a well-deserved tribute dinner to my friend, William W. Winpisinger, the international president. The proceeds from this dinner went to benefit the International Guiding Eyes—an organization close to the hearts of IAM members. They are proud that the IAM is the only union to have founded an organization of this kind in response to the need of a blind IAM member.

Bill Winpisinger's remarks at the anniversary dinner tell the story far better than I. And I think this simple story gives splendid witness to what the men and women of organized labor can do when they set their minds to it.

Mr. President, I submit for the RECORD Mr. Winpisinger's address.

The address follows:

ADDRESS BY MR. WINPISINGER

Tonight we're having a double celebration. We're celebrating the 30th anniversary of International Guiding Eyes and the 90th anniversary of the Machinists Union.

Just 90 years and a little over one month ago today 19 railroad machinists gathered in a locomotive pit at the end of a long working day in the city of Atlanta, Georgia and founded the union that has become the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers.

I wonder what those 19 founding fathers would think if they could see us now. Certainly they would never have believed the prices that were paid for the tickets that got you in here tonight.

In order to get this union started each of those 19 railroad machinists dug deep down into their overalls and came up with a grand total of $1.50 apiece.

That was a helluva lot of money in those days.

In 1888, $1.50 was most of a day's wages.

And the working day was not eight hours, but ten and even twelve.

So this union of ours was started by men who were willing to sacrifice for an idea:

The idea that labor has dignity and deserves a just return.

They knew that to give this idea meaning and substance they had to have a union.

But there was no way that they could foresee that this idea and their inspiration would one day be carried into every kind of industry in every part of the United States and Canada.

They could not foresee that from their little meeting would grow an organization that would touch and better the lives of millions of people in their work places, in their homes and in their communities.

NINETY YEARS OF SERVICE

Now, 90 years later, we can see what has come out of that small beginning, out of the idea and the inspiration that motivated these 19 otherwise ordinary, everyday, workingmen in 1888.

Because out of that first meeting has come one of the great unions on the North American continent.

This greatness is measured not only by contracts that are negotiated, not merely in terms of wages, hours, working conditions, pensions and other benefits that are secured at the bargaining table.

It is measured more significantly by the ways in which Machinists' locals and districts help to enrich the lives of others in their communities.

In cities, towns and villages throughout the United States and Canada the Machinists Union supports and works closely with Red Cross and United Fund Agencies.

Our members sponsored senior citizens club, little league baseball, scouting and midget football.

They contribute generously to the City of Hope and the IAM College Scholarship Fund.

Many locals sponsor training which enables members to counsel those in need of personal and family help from social agencies.

Yes, IAM members support, sponsor, donate and contribute time and money and service to many good causes.

But if there's one cause that is especially close to the hearts of Machinists Union members it is the International Guiding Eyes whose 30th anniversary we are concurrently celebrating here tonight.

This is, as far as anyone can determine, the only organization of its kind that was directly founded by a single union in response to the need of a single member.

INTERNATIONAL GUIDING EYES

Like the IAM itself, International Guiding Eyes grew from a small beginning.

It's a fascinating story and one that I think is worth telling.

This story began with a long-time Machinists Union member named Joseph W. Jones.

He was born in 1885 and in 1893, at the age of eight, he came down with a fever that left him temporarily blind.

Fortunately, by the time he was 16 he had regained enough of his sight so that with the aid of glasses he was able to learn the machinist trade and join the union.

He worked at the trade for more than 20 years but then, at the age of 38, his sight became so bad he had to give up his job as a machinist.

Despite his handicap he struggled along for 20 more years, supporting himself at odd jobs here and there.

Eventually he lost more than 90% of his vision, but he still refused to give up.

He started to look around and make inquiries about getting a guide dog.

At this point he was told he was too old.

He was 57 and was regarded as ready for the scrap heap.

Everywhere he asked he was turned down because of his age.

He tried all over the country, but everywhere the answer was the same.

He couldn't get a guide dog because he was too old.

At this point I think many people would have given up.

But Joe Jones was a true machinist.

He had what some people call bulldog tenacity and others call being as stubborn as a mule.

He decided that if he couldn't find an organization that would provide him with a guide dog he'd start one of his own.

And it damn well wouldn't discriminate against blind people because of their age or color or sex or religion or anything else.

As a good machinist of long-standing membership Joe took his idea to the Executive Council of his union in Washington, D.C.

On the basis of the presentation he made the Council endorsed the idea and International Guiding Eyes Incorporated was born.

That was in 1948.

That's the kind of thing that makes me proud to be International President of the Machinist Union.

Joe Jones died in 1957 at the age of 72, but the work he inspired lives on.

Joe Jones' dream has been given form and shape and reality by a host of dedicated men and women.

Originally they came from the ranks of the Machinists Union.

Now they come not only from the Machinists but from the entire labor movement, from management and from all parts of our society.

The task of building an organization like International Guiding Eyes hasn't been easy.

It has faced many obstacles and has suffered its share of setbacks.

But under the leadership of a Grand Lodge representative of the Machinists Union, who serves as its president, it is today a growing and flourishing institution.

Right now it is building a new $2½-million school which will more than double the number of its graduates to 18 per month.

Weather and money permitting this new school will be completed by the end of the year.

And I'm happy to say that the money that has been raised here tonight will help to make that completion possible.

I want to take this opportunity to pay tribute to Duke Lee who is the Grand Lodge representative who doubles as president of International Guiding Eyes.

Duke, you and your board of directors and your staff deserve a lot of credit.

Because of what you are doing, blind people from all over the world have been given mobility, independence and dignity.

It is indeed fitting that an organization that grew out of men's need for dignity has helped to create and support independence and dignity for others.

Keep up the good work.

Because of your efforts every member of the Machinists Union can walk a little taller.

That's what those 19 railroad machinists in Atlanta, Georgia, were seeking in 1888.

That's what Joe Jones was after in 1948.

And that's what the Machinists Union and the rest of the American labor movement are still all about in 1978.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, the proponents of tuition tax credits have previously introduced into the RECORD the results of public opinion polls and surveys showing the overwhelming support of the American public for such aid with educational expenses and the strong preference for tax credits as opposed to further grants and loans.

On Monday, July 24, the New York Daily News published the results of the first such poll known to me that specifically included elementary and secondary education in the question pertaining to tuition tax credits. Although not surprising, it is nonetheless noteworthy that two thirds of those responding favor that provision. I need hardly remind my colleagues that the Daily News opinion poll is renowed for its accuracy. I therefore submit the article containing the results of this poll for the RECORD.

The article follows:

Six out of 10 residents of the New York metropolitan area favor a measure approved by the Legislature to let tenants deduct from their federal income taxes the portion of their rent that goes to pay property taxes, according to the Daily News Opinion Poll.

Also, two thirds of the respondents said they favor a proposed federal income tax credit or deduction for tuition paid to colleges and private schools.

And half of those polled said they would like to see Congress cut the maximum capital gains tax from 50% to 25%.

The Daily News Poll, a random telephone survey of 400 adults in the city and Westchester, Rockland, Nassau and Suffolk counties, was conducted July 10, 11 and 12. Dr. Richard F. Link of Artronics Information System Inc. was the consultant.

In an effort to give renters the same tax advantages as home owners the Assembly and Senate last month passed a bill that would entitle tenants to a new federal tax deduction based on the property taxes paid by their landlords.

The measure was sent to Gov. Carey, who is expected to sign it.

WILL IRS ALLOW IT?

However, a major question concerning the legislation is whether the Federal Internal Revenue Service will allow it.

Metropolitan-area residents were even more in favor of federal tax credits for college tuition.

Last month, the House of Representatives approved a bill providing federal income tax credits of up to $250 for college tuition and $100 for tuition of pupils in private or parochial elementary and secondary schools. President Carter has threatened to veto the bill if it passes Congress.

HOUSE ACTION BACKED

The House action was hailed by supporters, including Catholic groups, as a step toward providing some measure of tax relief to middle-income Americans.

Opponents, including the United Federation of Teachers and major black organizations, viewed the action as a first step toward possible destruction of the public school system.

Poll respondents were asked: "Do you favor or oppose a measure approved by the State Legislature to let tenants deduct from their federal income taxes the portion of their rent that goes to pay property taxes?" They replied:

| | Percent |
|---|---|
| Favor | 61 |
| Oppose | 22 |
| Don't know | 17 |

They also were asked: "Do you favor or oppose the proposed federal income tax credit or deduction for tuition paid to colleges and private schools?" They responded:

| | Percent |
|---|---|
| Favor | 66 |
| Oppose | 24 |
| Don't know | 10 |

The final question was: "Do you favor or oppose a proposal in Congress to cut the maximum capital gains tax from 50% to 25%?" They answered:

| | Percent |
|---|---|
| Favor | 50 |
| Oppose | 23 |
| Don't know | 27 |

BUSINESS AND THE ENVIRONMENT

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, in recent years we have become increasingly aware of the conflicts that arise as our country attempts to reverse a trend of environmental degradation and also address a serious energy crisis. It is in this light that I was quite interested in a recent survey of business attitudes toward the environment. It revealed a growing corporate awareness that energy development and environmental protection are not two mutually exclusive concepts.

The survey, which analyzes the responses of 50 corporations operating in the Rocky Mountain West, was authored by Prof. James S. Bowman of the University of Wyoming and published by the Michigan State Graduate School of Business. I would like to share this survey with my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The survey follows:

BUSINESS AND THE ENVIRONMENT: CORPORATE ATTITUDES, ACTIONS IN ENERGY-RICH STATES

(By James S. Bowman)

In recent years the business community has become increasingly aware of environmental issues and alert to its political interest in ecology U.S. commerce and industry have many reasonable grounds for concern with pollution policy. The private sector is a prime resource consumer and environmental restrictions on resource availability are likely to affect its operations. It is also a major source of many pollutants and as such bears much of the responsibility for pollution control. Finally, a concern for capital investment, long-range industrial growth, corporate social policy, the economics of waste recovery, employee safety, and antipollution legislation all have led companies to formulate policies toward the environment. There are, in short, few large firms that do not have an interest in the development and conservation of the natural environment.

With the blossoming of ecology into national prominence came the painful recognition among industrial leaders that the public often regarded them as among the country's principal polluters. Since business tends to be more visible in its pollution than other segments of society, it presents a vulnerable target for environmental regulations. It is far easier, and more popular, for government to try to regulate corporate activities than it is to control the environmental behavior of individual voters. Yet, in its efforts to do something about pollution, government can never be truly effective without the widespread cooperation of industry. Public officials can set standards and can enforce them against particularly recalcitrant firms, but a high degree of voluntary compliance in the private sector is needed if there is going to be significant progress toward environmental quality.

Given the strategic role of industry in ecology, the attitudes and actions of business people are especially important. Although much has been said about industry's views toward the environment in recent years, there is surprisingly little systematic research on the topic. This study seeks to determine the contemporary corporate response to environmental issues. What is the state of environmental awareness in business today? What are the current implication of ecological problems for the private sector? What do industrialists see as the cause of environmental degradation? What programs and actions do executives feel are appropriate to deal with pollution? Finally, what are managerial attitudes toward social and political solutions to the nation's ecological problems? The objective of this analysis, then, is to ascertain whether environmental concern in today's society is being translated into revised corporate behavior.

THE RESEARCH STUDY

Since the U.S. business community is large in size and diverse in scope, it is unlikely to have uniform views toward the environment. In some cases, environmental concern may be of secondary importance to the firm (advertising and packaging for an electronic company); in others, ecological considerations may be of central significance (pollution abatement for a copper company). Similarly, a petroleum firm is very apt to have a conservation program, while a bank may have no compelling reason for one.

It seems desirable, therefore, to survey a select group of industries rather than to attempt to sample all pollution control situations. Accordingly, the data for this project were gathered from companies listed in the state mining and manufacturing directories for Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, and Montana. These industries, which are located in a region directly involved in today's energy crisis, are likely to encounter environmental problems in their daily operations. The firms participating in this study, therefore, provide an excellent opportunity to assess corporate environmental views.

Questionnaires were administered to the 50 largest concerns in each of the four states. These included chemical, electric utility, food products, paper, coal, petroleum, primary metal, rubber and plastics, and transportation equipment companies. The survey was based upon selected questions from several earlier studies, all of which either (1) sampled a cross section of U.S. businesses, (2) received a very low, and perhaps unreliable, response rate, (3) did not collect attitudinal information or, (4) are now outdated.[1] The questionnaire was mailed to the 200 firms in the Rocky Mountain states in the summer of 1976; it was returned by 137 companies, or 68.5 percent of the sample.

BUSINESS IMPLICATIONS OF ENVIRONMENTAL AWARENESS

A series of questions were asked the respondents in order to determine their views toward environmental problems and the implications of these problems for business. As the data in Table 1 indicate, attitudes are divided concerning the seriousness of ecological issues. While nearly one-half of the sample (48.2 percent) agreed that "pollution is one of the most serious problems facing the nation today," a full 40 percent disagreed. (The remainder were undecided or did not respond.) It seems that although a substantial number of industrialists regard pollution as an important issue, other problems (such as inflation, recession, energy development, and unemployment) are more important to a large portion of business people. A major oil company executive stated: "Pollution is a problem in our nation, but we need a proper perspective if we are to achieve a beneficial balance between environmental benefits and social-economic penalties." Fortune's national survey of 270 business officials in 1969 also showed that the environment is just one of a host of contemporary issues facing corporate America.

These findings do not necessarily mean that executives are not concerned about ecology. Despite speculation that the energy crisis and economic problems have dampened support for antipollution programs, over 85 percent of the sample agreed or strongly agreed with the second statement in Table 1, that "protection of the environment should be a major concern when we develop new energy resources." Similarly, a majority of managers rejected the notion that "we should be willing to accept more air and water pollution in order to ensure more plentiful supplies of energy." New issues, then, have attracted industry's attention, but ecology remains a very important factor in the development of natural resources. These views are summarized by responses to the following statement in Table 1: "All the concern about 'Ecology' is just a passing fad." More than 85 percent of the executives disagreed. It should be noted, however, that many business leaders feel that pollution issues have been exaggerated; over half of the respondents endorsed this view, and only 10.2 percent disagreed. In short, these findings suggest that business people are well aware of this serious, if overpublicized, problem and recognize that it is an issue that is here to stay.

This approach to ecology is supported by the answers to questions regarding the implications of conservation issues for business practices (see Table 2). These questions dealt with judgments executives might make when environmental restrictions affect basic corporate operations. Specifically, respondents were asked: "should environmental problems be taken into consideration if it means (1) slowing the introduction of new products, (2) forgoing an increase in production, and (3) reducing profits? While executives showed a willingness to consider environmental protection even if it conflicts with product innovation (72.3 percent of the sample), not as many were prepared to forgo production (58.4 percent) or reduce profits (57.7 percent) in the name of ecology. Similar findings were also detected in the 1974 Kefalas and Carroll cross-section survey of 142 of the nation's business leaders. These results can be contrasted to Fortune's 1969 countrywide study of executives, who were united in their answers with respect to these three issues—with all responses centered at about 85 percent. Nonetheless, the data show that U.S. business, including a majority of mining and manufacturing firms in a heavily impacted section of the nation, is willing to consider environmental problems even if the environmental goals conflict with fundamental corporate goals.

In summary, the evidence reveals that industry leaders regard the environment as a significant issue with potentially important implications for business management. While they are divided over whether or not pollution is one of the most serious problems facing the nation, large majorities agree that ecology is not a fad and that environmental protection is a legitimate concern in the development of energy supplies. Although environmental problems may be considered exaggerated, this does not mean that they are dismissed by corporate management as irrelevant. Indeed, most companies are prepared to take ecological considerations into account in basic decision making. Skeptics will no doubt question the sincerity and effectiveness of these expressions of concern, but the fact remains that environmental issues have stayed on the corporate agenda long after Earth Day, 1970.

CAUSE AND RESPONSIBILITY

We have seen that mining and manufacturing officials in the Rocky Mountain West place considerable importance on environmental issues in business management. What do they see as the cause of ecological problems? Who do they believe should have the primary responsibility for protecting our natural surroundings? In an attempt to specify the origins of environmental pollution, respondents were asked the following question.

In your opinion, which one of the following statements best describes the basic cause of environmental degradation?

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| Our society is preoccupied with economic growth and pays too little attention to environmental quality | 7.3 | 10 |
| The public is more concerned with convenience and comfort than with preservation of resources and prevention of pollution | 40.1 | 55 |
| As a socio-economic system capitalism inevitably leads to exploitation and degradation of the environment | 3.6 | 5 |
| Any society of 200 million with a high standard of living will face severe problems in avoiding environmental degradation | 43.1 | 59 |
| No response | 5.8 | 8 |
| | 100.0 | 137 |

Over 40 percent of the sample believe that any society with a high standard of living and a large population inevitably will have pollution problems. Perhaps a major reason for this is suggested by the second most frequently chosen response—that the public is more concerned with personal convenience than environmental impact. Interestingly, very few business people (7.3 percent) said that ecological degradation is the result of an emphasis on economic growth. This belief is not shared by many environmentalists. Even fewer business people endorsed the claim that U.S. capitalism leads to the exploitation of nature.

These executives, then, view the environmental crisis as the unfortunate consequence of a modern industrial society that caters to the material desires of its population. A petroleum company executive wrote: "We are a nation of pampered people. America has about 6 percent of the world population, yet it uses about one-third of the world's energy." Managers do not believe, however, that environmental pollution is a result of fundamental business goals and institutional behavior patterns, such as industrial expansion or the socioeconomic system itself. For example, the respondents were asked to what extent they agreed or disagreed with the statement that "American beliefs and values have been a basic cause of our present environmental problems." Although about one-third of the sample agreed with this item, a plurality (46.0 percent) rejected it, and the rest were undecided. These findings, taken in the aggregate and coupled with the evidence presented below, suggest that the cause of environmental degradation is essentially human oversight, carelessness, and neglect.

If any mass, consumer-oriented society is likely to experience ecological problems, who should deal with these problems? Executives were asked: "Do you feel that environmental protection and pollution control are primarily the responsibility of government, industry, or the private citizen?" Most respondents (52.6 percent) indicated that industry should shoulder the burden; about one-fourth selected government, and one-sixth the private citizen. Respondents not only feel that environmental protection is the responsibility of business, but also believe that business is not doing enough. In this matter they seem to agree with Robert W. Fri's view that "from my observations, few companies have yet moved out as aggressively or imaginatively as they might."[2] Nearly 60 percent of the sample disagreed with the statement that "industry is doing everything possible to prevent pollution;" 24 percent agreed. (The rest were undecided.)

This concern for social responsibility on the part of business was foreshadowed when it was found that environmental problems play an important role in corporate decision making. This finding, however, is at odds with the cross-industry survey by the Wall Street Journal in the early 1970s. In that study, as well as the 1969 Fortune poll, substantial majorities of executives said that environmental protection should be the responsibility of government. Perhaps this reversal of opinion, at least among mining and manufacturing concerns in the Rocky Mountain states, is due to the fact that as governmental regulatory activity has increased in recent years, it has been looked upon as an infringement on private enterprise. Companies reported, for example, that environmental restrictions have affected their business in nearly all areas, including product cost, production, investment, corporate image, sales, and labor relations (data not shown in the tables). In short, the willingness of business leaders to act as "good corporate citizens" stems from their concern for the environment as well as industry self-interest; thoughtful executives realize that the failure to deal with ecological problems will subject them to even greater regulation in the future.

POLLUTION: A CONCERN FOR GOVERNMENT AND CITIZEN TOO

The readiness of industry to play the major role in environmental clean-up deserves closer examination. Perhaps the results reported in the last section can be explained in light of respondents' views of government regulation and citizen action. Not unexpectedly, over 85 percent of the managers agreed that "in its efforts to protect the environment, government interferes with business and industry too much." One plywood manufacturer in Montana said that the term environmental quality was "nothing but a scare word used to increase governmental power." More specifically, although most executives believe that the federal government's approach to environmental protection is acceptable in terms of timeliness, most find that its approach is unrealistic (see Table 3). A Utah cement plant executive said: "I don't believe environmental deterioration is continuing—it's improving. Let's not go overboard with more and more governmental control to the point that we're all out of business."

Thus, when asked what they would like to see the federal government do in the area of environmental protection, 54.7 percent sought reduced regulatory activities, 16.1 percent supported the status quo, 5.1 percent advocated increased governmental activities, and the remainder were undecided. Compared to the 1969 Fortune poll, the managers in this study generally see governmental action as more timely but also less realistic than do their colleagues in other businesses around the country. This analysis and the 1974 Kefalas and Carroll national survey show that there is substantially less enthusiasm for a major governmental role in environmental quality than was true at the turn of the decade.

The concern over governmental control is complemented by managerial attitudes toward citizen activists in environmental affairs. More than 80 percent of the sample agreed that the "antipollution movement tends to base its activities on emotions rather than facts." A spokesman for a Montana lumber company warned that citizens must "become much better informed about the relationship of economics to environmental improvement." Similarly, the president of a well-servicing company in Wyoming advised environmentalists to take a "non-emotional, economical approach since the nation cannot undo overnight that which took centuries to create." A large percentage of the respondents also believe that environmentalists "do not represent the interests of most people in our society." Instead, most managers regard conservation organizations "as simply pressure groups [that] do not represent public opinion." These views appear to be pervasive throughout the business community, as the 1974 Kefalas and Carroll study also revealed that executives had negative opinions about such organizations.

| Number | 18.8 | 39.1 | 39.9 | 9.4 | 3.6 | |

Note: N=137. Number line figures refer to the 1974 Kefalas and Carroll national survey.

These findings stand in contrast, however, to the 1969 Fortune study and the 1971 Wall Street Journal survey, which showed that business people across the nation held comparatively favorable views of these groups. Indeed, the situation has become so polarized in recent years that nearly one-half of the present sample endorsed the view that "the 'Ecology Movement' represents a serious threat to our society." A Utah manufacturer emphasized that his major concern regarding environmental matters was not product design, investment in new equipment, or low profits, but "minority rule activists." Similarly, the president of a mining machinery firm stated that industry leaders should "educate the so-called environmentalists to the fact that almost every aspect of their lives is dependent upon industry" and that "those who are ignorant of the importance of industry are against the future of this country." In short, companies prefer to assume the responsibility for pollution control because of their concern about big government and citizen groups, both of which may be regarded as obstructive, uninformed, and/or dangerous.

While this concern for social responsibility is welcomed and holds true for specific issues (for example, two-thirds of the sample agreed that "mining companies should be required to restore strip-mined land to its original state"), a question remains. Is the apparent antagonism of industry toward government and pressure groups in the best interest of the environment? Just as there is no one villain in the environmental crisis, it is unlikely that any single institution in society will be able to cope effectively with the problem. The go-it-alone approach may be useful in specific cases, but it is unlikely to be productive in the long run. People cannot attempt to solve a problem if they cannot agree upon the basic facts about the problem they are trying to solve.

If it is true, for example, that environmental issues tend to be exaggerated (see above), it is also true that business people have overstated the effect of pollution controls on the economy. Executives were asked the following question:

Pollution control laws have caused—

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| A few companies to close in the last five years (less than 100 nationwide) | 36.5 | 50 |
| A "moderate" number of companies to close (approximately 500) | 23.4 | 32 |
| Many companies to close (over 1,000) | 36.5 | 50 |
| No response | 3.6 | 5 |
| Total | 100.0 | 137 |

least 500 companies have been forced to close due to environmental considerations. According to the New York Times, 81 plants (involving 17,600 workers) have been put out of business as a result of federal enforcement actions since 1970.[3] While several closures have received national publicity, most plants that shut down were marginal profit makers with obsolete equipment. Furthermore, the displaced workers found employment in other firms that expanded their share of the market as a result of their competitors' unwillingness to invest in pollution abatement equipment. In fact, there has been a net increase of more than one million jobs due to increased expenditures on water and solid waste pollution clean-up efforts.

The business leaders surveyed also overestimate the effect of antipollution programs on economic inflation. When asked the question shown below, most industrialists felt that such activities had at least a 3 percent effect on inflation. Less than one of every seven respondents knew that the impact of these programs has been in the realm of one-half of one percent.[4]

In your opinion, antipollution programs in this country have—

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| No effect on the rate of inflation | 1.5 | 2 |
| Little effect on the rate of inflation (for example, one percent or less) | 10.9 | 15 |
| Some effect on the rate of inflation (for example, 3–5 percent) | 59.1 | 81 |
| A major effect on the rate of inflation (over 5 percent) | 24.8 | 34 |
| No response | 3.6 | 5 |
| Total | 100.0 | 137 |

In summary, the objective here has not been to offer praise for industry's determination to assume responsibility for pollution control nor to criticize its exaggerated views of the negative economic effects of conservation programs. The point is that since nearly everyone agrees that the environment is an important problem, government, citizens, and industry might be able to lay the groundwork for a more comprehensive and constructive approach if they were more willing to listen to one another and agree on basic facts. As the 1970 Conference Board Record report on pollution control emphasized, the renewal and protection of the environment are costly and complex tasks that require the cooperative effort of both the public and private sectors. Evidence of an improved dialogue between all concerned is beginning to appear (see Industry Week, April 7, 1975, and company policy statements shown in the next section), but the attitudinal data reported here show that there is still a long way to go.

Footnotes at end of article.

ENVIRONMENTAL PROGRAMS IN INDUSTRY

Given industry's concern for ecology and its interest in tackling environmental problems, in what antipollution actions does it participate? What is the general purpose of these activities? How many corporate resources are invested in such programs? Finally, what do executives believe are the best incentives to strengthen these policies?

Nearly 70 percent of the businesses surveyed indicated that they were actively involved in an internal, industrywide, or community based environmental program. Most companies had a formal or implicit policy on social responsibility and the environment. Some policies were more comprehensive than others, reflecting management philosophies that ranged from progressive environmental improvement to reluctant compliance with the law. Representative examples of formal and informal policies are displayed below.

We are dedicated to protecting and improving the physicial environment and therefore are committed to controlling environmental pollution in all forms. In addition to strict compliance with all laws . . . it is the policy of [this company] to cooperate with civic, professional, industrial, and research agencies . . . to solve environmental problems [formal statement].

Our company has used pollution control devices since 1929, though perhaps not as effective as those used today. While we have no written policy, all existing plants are equipped to surpass all antipollution standards [informal policy].

In general, these findings, which are similar to the 1972 and 1974 American Management Association (AMA) national surveys as well as the earlier Fortune study, suggest that the proportion of U.S. corporations involved in environmental activities probably has not declined in recent years and that businesses in heavily impacted industries are not necessarily more likely than other firms to have such programs. It should be noted that participation in these activities does not always mean that there is a connection between the company statement and effective pollution control. Yet, such policies are a record of the position to which management has committed the organization. As the 1972 AMA research report on business and ecology pointed out, such policies enable individuals in organizations to focus on environmental problems—a process that encourages meaningful action.

A follow-up question was asked the respondents in order to ascertain the general approach of these programs.

In general, what is your company's aim with regard to environmental pollution problems?

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| Prevent or minimize future danger of pollution | 47.4 | 65 |
| Eliminate or reduce present danger of pollution | 18.2 | 25 |
| Remedy the effects of past pollution | .7 | 1 |
| Our company does not face significant environmental problems | 31.4 | 43 |
| No response | 2.2 | 3 |
| | 100.0 | 137 |

Like the 1969 Fortune and 1971 Wall Street Journal studies, the results here show that most corporations are future oriented in their antipollution efforts. Nearly half of the firms indicated that their primary aims is to prevent or minimize future pollution. About one company in six stated that its main objective is to cope with current pollution dangers. Only one of the 137 corporations surveyed said that its primary objective is to remedy the effects of past environmental degraduation.

An especially interesting finding was that almost one-third of the largest mining and manufacturing firms in the four states indicated that "our company does not face significant environmental problems." On the one hand, this suggests that even though a large minority of corporations say that they do not have pollution problems, they are still environmentally concerned (see Table 1). On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that 30 percent of these pollution prone industries in this part of the nation do not face important environmental issues.

In addition to the existence and purpose of conservation programs, an effort was made to ascertain the amount of resources invested in environmental protection. The executives were asked: "What percentage of your last annual budget was spent on pollution control?" The responses were as follows:

What percentage of your company's last annual budget was spent on pollution control?

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| 0 to 4 percent | 48.9 | 67 |
| 5 to 9 percent | 17.5 | 24 |
| 10 to 14 percent | 12.4 | 17 |
| 15 to 19 percent | .7 | 1 |
| Over 20 percent | 5.3 | 8 |
| No response | 14.6 | 20 |
| Total | 100.0 | 137 |

While it might be expected that many companies would regard such information as proprietary, nearly 85 percent of the firms supplied these data. Furthermore, earlier studies (such as the 1974 AMA survey) revealed that independent checks agreed closely with budgetary figures reported in business surveys. It is with some confidence, then, that it can be reported that approximately half of the firms spent 4 percent or less on pollution control. As shown, a substantial number invested between 5 and 9 percent (17.5 percent of the sample) and 10 and 14 percent (12.4 percent) on abatement expenditures. Only one company spent up to 20 percent of its annual budget on environmental activities. Eight firms spent over 20 percent of their budgets on pollution control, which reflects the fact that even in pollution prone industries, the burden is unevenly distributed. In general, the comparative data from earlier nationwide, cross-industry surveys suggest that there are relatively more companies paying small amounts for environmental protection in the Rocky Mountain states than was the case for the entire business community several years ago. Arguments continue over whether or not such expenditure levels are enough to cope effectively with the situation. Suffice it to say that there is little debate over the need for environmental protection; it is the pace and thoroughness of environmental restoration that is at issue. These problems are likely only to be solved in the political arena.

Finally, what do executives think about pollution control incentives for business?

What do you think would be the most effective incentive to business to do something more about pollution?

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| Tax credits for pollution controls costs | 57.7 | 79 |
| Industrywide action | 7.3 | 10 |
| Government grants matching company expenditures | 5.1 | 7 |
| Government subsidies | 2.2 | 3 |
| Passing the costs to consumers | 14.6 | 20 |
| Improvement in the working environment | 7.3 | 10 |
| No response | 5.8 | 8 |
| | 100.0 | 137 |

As shown, most industrialists regard governmental assistance in the form of tax credits as the best stimulus to environmental improvement, a finding comparable to the 1969 Fortune survey. Although executives indicated earlier that the private sector should bear the prime responsibility for pollution control, this apparently does not mean increased costs to consumers, accepting government monies (grants or direct subsidies), or self-initiated action by industry (improving the work environment or industrywide action). Thus, while tax credits are quite acceptable, business people are very reluctant to accept direct governmental assistance to encourage investment in environmental protection programs.

In summary, more than two-thirds of these companies are involved in antipollution efforts. The purpose of these activities is to minimize future environmental degradation more than to deal with the effects of current or past pollution. Most companies are investing what the Fortune survey referred to as "small" (less than 4 percent) proportions of their budgets in pollution controls. Executives believe that the most effective incentive for further environmental improvement is the use of tax credits to offset pollution abatement costs.

CONCLUSION: SOLVING POLLUTION PROBLEMS IN AMERICAN SOCIETY

This study has documented that mining and manufacturing corporations in a heavy impacted section of the nation regard the protection of the environment as a major concern in business operations. Reference to earlier cross-industry and nationwide surveys permitted rough comparisons with respect to the causes of ecological deterioration, the roles and responsibilities of business vis-a-vis government and the private citizen in environmental activities, and the nature of pollution control programs in the private sector. Changing societal values are being integrated into corporate environmental practices either as a consequence of government prompting or of the redefinition of business self-interest.[5]

Concern for the environment does not necessarily override other important societal and business goals. More than 75 percent of the sample, for example, agreed that "economic growth is nearly always good for any community" (see Table 4). More specifically, a similar proportion of the managers supported the statements that "a certain amount of environmental damage . . . will have to be tolerated as a price for economic stability" and that "we cannot afford to let policies claiming to promote environmental quality prevent the continued economic development of this state." A Montana paper company executive said pollution "should be controlled if it is significant and can be economically handled."

Industrialists believe that a balanced approach to the development and conservation of the nation's resources is the most responsible way to meet the needs of U.S. society.

Footnotes at end of article.

Most executive supported the statement that "pollution is a waste, and [if we can] put it to productive use we are safeguarding economic development and environmental protection." Nearly 90 percent of the executives agreed that "it is possible to have both industrial growth and a quality environment." A senior official in a petroleum company said: "We think considerable progress has been made in reducing pollution. Vehicle emissions have been reduced by a factor of 80–90 percent. . . . This progress indicates that the nation can protect and improve the environment and maintain economic growth." In short, business leaders see the necessity to keep a perspective on environmental issues and to act with restraint in dealing with these problems.

These views are summarized in the responses received to the following question:

Which one of the following statements best describes your attitude regarding the solution of environmental problems in our society?

| | Percent | N |
|---|---|---|
| Environmental problems can be solved within our present political-economic system if enough people become involved | 76.6 | 105 |
| Environmental problems can be solved only if significant changes are made in our present political-economic system | 15.3 | 21 |
| Environmental problems can be solved only if our present political-economic system is replaced by a radically different system | 1.5 | 2 |
| No response | 6.6 | 9 |
| | 100.0 | 137 |

Over 75 percent of the managers believe that environmental problems can be solved within the existing political-economic system. Although approximately one-sixth of the sample admitted to the need for significant change in present institutions, no more than 1.5 percent entertain the idea of radical departures from the status quo. A representative comment of the majority viewpoint was made by a Utah manufacturer: "Environmental protection is possible with the present economic structure and need not seriously penalize our economic progress."

The method by which the current system can solve environmental problems is through science and technology. Over 80 percent of the executives in the four states agreed that "scientific research and technological innovation can solve envirnomental problems" (see Table 4). A steel company executive stated: "We have solved our pollution problems in this plant; industry cannot do it all at once. Pollution control is not instant. Technology needs time." A concrete plant manager indicated that "there must be a balance between existing conditions and the present state of technology. Industry must move in this direction, but should not be pushed so hard as to cause economic hardship." In a similar vein, a majority of the respondents believe that economics and technology are the most neglected areas of environmental knowledge as opposed to human behavior, politics, or law (data not shown in tables).

This evidence reinforces the earlier findings that most executives believe environmental degradation is not caused by basic behavior patterns as reflected in present institutions, but instead is a consequence of societal oversight. While this may not be the view of most environmentalists, who believe that the modern industrial state requires considerable reform, it is significant that this key sector of the economy is concerned about environmental disruption and that no less than 70 percent believe that "American society really does not have the option of not paying environmental costs" (see Table 4.)

In conclusion, for 200 years the private sector of the U.S. economy has tried to provide the goods and services needed by society under conditions that seemed acceptable to all. In recent times, however, business people have been challenged to reexamine past practices and objectives. Industrial growth, for example, has come to mean serving the economic needs of society with the least environmental damage. Since industries in the Rocky Mountain states occupy a vital position in today's economy, it is encouraging that they say they are ready to deal with environmental problems.

ACTIONS AGAINST INTERNATIONAL TERRORISM

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on Monday, July 17, the leaders of the seven major noncommunist industrial nations agreed to take assertive action against air piracy. President Carter and the leaders of Britain, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, and Japan reached an agreement to cut off commercial airline service to or from any country that harbors airline hijackers. I applaud this action as a long-awaited and much-needed first step toward increased international cooperation against hijackers and terrorists of all kinds.

Fortunately, this country has been relatively free from internal incidents of terrorism. Domestic measures to counter this threat have proven fairly effective so far. In the case of hijackings, during the 5 years prior to 1972 there was one successful hijacking attempt every 20 days. Since initiating electronic searches of air passengers and luggage 5 years ago, the FAA reports only two successful hijackings in the United States.

However, despite the progress made in this country, citizens of the United States continue to be threatened by acts of international terrorism when they travel in countries with less thorough security measures. During the first half of 1977 there were 14 attempted airline hijackings in other parts of the world, seven of which were successful.

Between 1968 and 1975, there were 330 incidents of international terrorism which directly affected U.S. citizens, corporations, or institutions, including 59 kidnappings, 136 bombings, and 15 assassinations.

We have also witnessed during the past few years an increasing degree of cooperation among international terrorist groups. Palestinians, members of the Japanese Red Army, and West German urban guerrillas have trained side by side in camps in the Middle East. The situation is aggravated by countries which harbor and aid terrorist groups.

The appropriate response to this threat seems to be a response in kind—a banding together of peace-loving nations to take action which will show that we will not condone violent political coercion by small groups of terrorists. Monday's agreement in Bonn can be more meaningful if it is followed by a sincere effort by the seven nations to join a mutual campaign against international terrorism.

S. 2236, an act to combat international terrorism, was reported out of the Governmental Affairs Committee on May 15, 1978. This bill urges the President to place a high priority on international agreements such as the one reached on Monday. This legislation would also promote technical assistance in aviation security to foreign governments by the United States, and would allow strong unilateral U.S. action against countries which support terrorist activities. I am hopeful that this bill will become law, as it represents a significant contribution on our part to the fight against international terrorism.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to include in the RECORD an article from the Washington Post in which the text of the Bonn agreement against hijacking is printed.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 18, 1978]

HIJACK AGREEMENT—MOVE TO COMBAT AIR PIRACY IS VIEWED AS TOUGHEST YET

(By Michael Getler)

BONN.—An unprecedented antiterrorism agreement that would cut off commercial airline service to or from any country that harbors airplane hijackers was agreed on here yesterday by the seven major noncommunist industrial nations.

Although the hastily developed accord raises many unanswered questions and has several potential loopholes, the immediate reaction of airline specialists was that the new accord was by far the toughest stand ever taken in this field.

Officials here said it was the first time that such a powerful group of governments—that together virtually dominate commercial air travel and the airports used to connect with international flights—had acted together to try to combat air piracy.

The accord, if it works, would go well beyond various U.N. conventions that condemn hijacking but carry no penalties or binding pledges of action. It would also be in line with longstanding boycott demands of the International Airline Pilots Association.

The agreement among the leaders of Britain, Canada, France, West Germany, Italy, Japan and the United States was announced at the close of a two-day economic summit meeting here.

"The heads of state and government," the brief statement says, "concerned over terrorism and hostage taking, declare that their governments will intensify their common undertaking to fight international terrorism.

"In cases in which a country refuses to extradite or legally prosecute airplane hijackers and/or to give back such airplanes, the heads of state and government are unanimously agreed through their governments to take immediate action to cease all flights to that country.

"At the same time, their governments will implement steps to ban incoming flights from that country as well as flights by airlines of that country flying from any other country."

The signers said they would also urge other governments to join them in this commitment.

The unanswered questions about the accord's effectiveness are technical and political.

How long, for example, will the seven nations wait before they jointly decide that a country has refused to extradite or legally prosecute a hijacker? How will they coordinate their decisions and what happens if a radically oriented country agrees to prosecute hijackers and then gives them a little more than a slap on the wrist?

In addition, the use of the "and/or" terminology raises questions whether the countries would act if the plane is returned, even though a country harbors the hijackers.

Politically, there are doubts among diplomats that France, for example, would join in economic action against its former colony Algeria, or that others with oil connections to Libya would take action against that country. These countries, along with Iraq and South Yemen, are major targets of the antihijack measure, although no countries were named.

Officials here had no immediate answers for the technical questions. U.S. officials told reporters that the leaders at the summit here are expected to go back to their respective governments to figure out what needs to be done to carry out these pledges.

Nevertheless, an experienced European airline specialist said, "Just the fact that these countries have openly identified themselves as intent on doing this is of major importance."

Inclusion of the antihijack measure at the economic summit was unexpected. The matter, according to U.S. officials, was first raised informally by Japanese Prime Minister Takeo Fukuda and then pursued in detail by Canadian Prime Minister Pierre Elliott Trudeau to the point where a document was developed in the course of the short meeting.

THE COSTS OF FEDERAL REGULATION: CATERPILLAR TRACTOR CO. CITES BURDEN

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the Caterpillar Tractor Co. has just completed a study of the effects of Federal regulation. The firm found that it spent an estimated $67.6 million in 1976 to comply with regulations.

This is a startlingly high figure—it is almost one-fourth as much as the firm spends to buy rough steel. Caterpillar's study dramatizes the urgency of the need to reform Federal regulation.

I wish to commend Caterpillar for its initiative in preparing this important study. It has added measurably to the hard facts upon which we can rely. I urge other firms to undertake similar analyses of their own regulatory costs.

Because of the contribution which the Caterpillar study makes to regulatory reform, I ask unanimous consent that the findings and observations section of the study may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Caterpillar study: Findings and observations

The cost to Caterpillar, during 1976, of complying with U.S. government regulation is estimated at $67.6 million, including:

| | Million |
|---|---|
| Administrative and operating costs | $21.5 |
| Capital costs | 22.0 |
| Product costs | 24.1 |

A breakdown of these costs follows:

Regulatory costs for 1976: Caterpillar Tractor Co. (U.S. Regulation Only)

| Agency or department: | Total costs due to regulations |
|---|---|
| Environmental Protection Agency (*) | $32,168,709 |
| Occupational Health & Safety Administration () | 31,090,895 |
| Equal Employment Opportunity and Affirmative Action | 1,198,334 |
| Federal Trade Commission and Department of Justice | 821,973 |
| Department of Transportation | 768,164 |
| Interstate Commerce Commission | 306,635 |
| Department of Defense | 259,841 |
| Department of Commerce | 220,740 |
| Department of Treasury | 197,787 |
| Civil Aeronautics Board | 150,243 |
| Department of Labor | 91,618 |
| Securities & Exchange Commission | 84,891 |
| Department of the Interior | 74,356 |
| National Labor Relations Board | 41,627 |
| Federal Communications Commission | 32,943 |
| Federal Energy Administration | 19,986 |
| Federal Power Commission | 13,751 |
| Consumers Product Safety Commission | 10,301 |
| All Others | 52,554 |
| Total | $67,605,348 |

(*) Of which $10,258,709 is Administrative/Operating cost; $21,800,000 Capital cost; and $110,000 Product cost.

() Of which $6,936,445 is Administrative/Operating cost; $167,450 Capital cost; and $23,987,000 Product cost.

Of the $67.6 million cost, it may be seen that over 90 percent resulted from regulations imposed by two agencies (EPA and OSHA) which didn't exist prior to 1970.

Comparisons with corporate goals provide a degree of perspective on these statistics. (The comparisons do not imply that productive investment in the company was decreased because of the $67.6 million expenditure to meet government regulation.) Comparing the $67.6 million to other costs, in 1976 Caterpillar:

Expended almost one-fourth as much on government regulation as for the purchase of rough steel.

Expended almost as much on government regulation as for worldwide energy needs.

Expended more for government regulation than for Social Security: and about the same on government regulation as on all medical benefits in the U.S.

Expended more than one-third as much for government regulation as the company paid in U.S. federal income taxes.

Expended half as much on government regulation as for dividends paid to shareholders.

International trade is extremely important to the nation as well as Caterpillar. Though we lack adequate comparative data about impact of regulatory costs on non-U.S. competitors, there is reason to believe Caterpillar's cost of regulation is higher than non-U.S. competitors. Thus the cost of regulation could impair our ability to sell products abroad.

There is currently much concern that the U.S. is losing some international competitive advantage because of reduced corporate expenditures on research and engineering. Yet a rising share of the U.S. technology effort is going into compliance with government regulation. Thus, regulation could siphon off funds and skills needed to maintain U.S. technical competitiveness.

Obviously, Caterpillar as a company does not absorb all regulatory costs. Most of these costs are passed on to users of our products and ultimately to the consumer in many forms. Higher utility bills and higher costs of highway construction are two examples. The objective, however, is not to reduce regulatory costs indiscriminately. It is rather to establish, through study and analysis, a factual basis for eliminating unnecessary regulation and improving the administration of necessary regulatory programs.

PLANNING FOR A UNITED NATIONS ALTERNATE ENERGY CONFERENCE

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, on April 18, 1978, Senator McGOVERN and I sent a letter to the Congressional Research Service requesting that it examine the advisability of convening a United Nations Conference on Alternate Energy Sources and establishing a new International Alternate Energy Commission. This request stemmed from the introduction of Concurrent Resolution 62 by Senator Hubert Humphrey, later reintroduced by Senator McGOVERN as Concurrent Resolution 71.

The initial paper done for us by CRS provided an analysis of why a conference would be an effective means of launching a new international commission. The paper also forcefully brought out the need for this country to undertake a serious effort to utilize alternative energy sources in order to demonstrate to Third World nations our own commitment to these energy sources.

However, since we wrote this letter and received CRS' report, events have moved quickly. The United Nations Economic and Social Council decides this month whether to accept a proposal for such a conference done at its request by Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim's office. The State Department has already agreed to support and push for the acceptance of the Waldheim proposal.

As a result of these developments, Senator McGOVERN and I decided that CRS should turn quickly to the specific issues involved in organizing this conference. Therefore, we wrote a second letter requesting that CRS examine among other items, what the actual preparatory process for this conference and commission should entail, how the conference should be structured, what the specific focus should be, where it should take place, and how long it should take.

Senator McGOVERN and I believe that the final paper CRS produces could be extremely helpful to all those concerned with planning this conference. The paper could be disseminated widely and used as a means to get concrete preparations underway.

The developed and developing nations need to sit down together and seriously discuss the world energy problem and the ability of alternative energy sources to help solve this problem. This proposed United Nations conference would provide an appropriate forum to hold this discussion. Therefore, Senator McGOVERN and I are determined to do what we can to assure that this conference takes place.

Mr. President, I ask that excerpts from the CRS paper on the United Nations Alternate Energy Conference and Commission and the two letters to CRS be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., April 18, 1978.

Dr. GILBERT GUDE,
Director, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR GIL: Senator Humphrey, in one of his last official acts as Senator, introduced Concurrent Resolution 62 (recently reintroduced by the undersigned as Concurrent Resolution 71) requesting the United Nations to convene a World Alternate Energy Conference in 1980. The goal of this conference, as expressed in the Resolution, would be the establishment of an International Alternate Energy Commission comparable to the International Atomic Energy Agency.

Since the Arab oil embargo and the subsequent five-fold increase in oil prices, many developing nations, unable to pay these prices, have had to forego their development aspirations. Those developing countries which have continued to import oil have done so at the risk of international bankruptcy as their debts to international lending institutions have mounted precipitously.

The United Nations General Assembly has discussed on innumerable occasions ways in which nations can be relieved of the high oil price burden. One possible means suggested by the General Assembly is the establishment of an International Energy Institute. The Secretary General, Kurt Waldheim, was delegated the responsibility of proposing specific functions for such an organization. He recommended that it:

Monitor resources.

Analyse and exchange information on alternative energy sources.

Advance global planning to avoid shortages in the future.

Promote cooperation between those who have financial and technological resources and those who do not.

Orient research and development towards meeting the requirements of widely differing situations.

Assist in the transfer and adaptation of energy technology.

Encourage development of indigenous or regional energy capacities.

Train personnel.

Unfortunately, little visible progress toward implementation of this idea has occurred. Moreover, while the United Nations has held very successful Conferences on Food and the Environment, and is now preparing for a Conference on Science and Technology Transfer, it has not yet convened a major conference focusing on global energy problems.

We believe that such a conference, followed by the establishment of an International Energy Commission, could have substantial benefits for both the developing and the developed world. There does not appear, however, to be sufficient momentum at this time to begin substantive planning for either a conference or an International Commission. We are hopeful that the introduction of Senator Humphrey's Resolution could provide the necessary catalyst to begin generating momentum to move these ideas into the planning stages.

Planning for such a conference and commission requires a great deal of thought. We believe that the Congressional Research Service can contribute many helpful ideas. We would like CRS to prepare a concept paper on the idea of a UN energy conference and commission.

With respect to the idea of a Conference on Alternate Energy Sources, we would like CRS to:

Examine the concept proposed in Senator Humphrey's Resolution, and analyse whether such a conference would be worth holding.

Examine past United Nations Conference to determine the most appropriate format for this conference.

Determine ways in which the support of LDC leaders for this conference could be enlisted.

Determine which international and foreign agencies might provide valuable planning assistance for this conference.

Determine what, if anything, the U.S. Congress could do to assist in the planning for this conference.

Determine the best process and mechanism by which American public support could be assured for this conference.

With respect to the idea of an International Energy Commission, we would like CBS to:

Examine past UN preliminary proposals for an International Energy Institute, paying particular attention to ways in which the emphasis on renewable energy technology can be strengthened.

Suggest ways in which the support of LDCs can be generated to push these UN proposals out of the preliminary planning stages.

Suggest ways in which the Congress and the relevant departments and agencies of the Federal government may assist the United Nations in the development of these proposals.

In addition to the work done by CRS, we hope there might be an opportunity to use outside consultants under CRS guidance, especially in connection with a possible CRS workshop following the completion of the concept paper.

In carrying out this project, we should like to continue working with the Energy section and the Natural Resources section of the Environment and Natural Resources Division. Preliminary discussions have already taken place with Dr. Frances Gulick and Dr. Denis Little.

We appreciate your assistance and cooperation.

Sincerely,

CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senator.
GEORGE MCGOVERN,
U.S. Senator.

U.S. SENATE,
Washington, D.C., June 21, 1978.

Mr. GILBERT GUDE,
Director, Congressional Research Service, Library of Congress, Washington, D.C.

DEAR GIL: On April 18, 1978 we requested that the Congressional Research Service examine the advisability of holding a United Nations Conference on Alternate Energy Sources and establishing a new International Alternate Energy Commission. We also asked CRS to suggest means by which sufficient momentum could be generated in developing nations and in this country to bring these ideas to fruition and how the actual planning process could be implemented. This request stemmed from the introduction of Concurrent Resolution 62 by Senator Humphrey (reintroduced by the undersigned as Concurrent Resolution 71) urging the United Nations to convene a World Alternate Energy Conference in 1980.

We commend Dr. Gulick for her useful analysis of why such a conference and new international commission are both advisable and necessary. In addition, Dr. Gulick forcefully brought out the importance of a comprehensive domestic effort to utilize renewable energy technology as the best means of enlisting Third World support and enthusiasm for this conference.

However, the CRS concept paper failed to address some of our other questions. We understand Dr. Gulick's feeling that the development and refinement of conference plans should not be addressed before the broader issues are examined. Nonetheless, we believe that the specific questions concerning the preparation and structure of the conference and commission should not be postponed. Therefore, we would like CRS to examine the other topics listed in our April 18 letter.

In examining these other topics, it might be useful for CRS to pay attention to the following questions:

(1) What should the actual preparatory process entail? Should panels of known experts be convened as a first step? If so, what topics should they examine and what factors should they take into account in arriving at their conclusions?

(2) How could the findings of these panels be most effectively utilized for this conference?

(3) Should the "National Paper" concept now being used for the forthcoming United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development be used again for this conference? If so, what should these papers include and who should be responsible for producing them?

(4) How can non-governmental organizations (e.g. The International Solar Energy Society) be most effectively used?

(5) Would regional intergovernmental meetings be necessary as a prelude to this conference?

(6) Does the United Nations system presently have the capabilities and staff to prepare for this conference or would additional staff need to be hired?

(7) How should the actual conference be structured, where should it be held, and how many days should it take?

(8) Other than through the creation of an International Alternate Energy Commission, what methods can be devised to assure that the technical information gathered and the policy decisions made at the Conference will have a lasting effect on the energy paths chosen by the participating nations?

It was determined, during discussions on this project between CRS staff and Ms. Sandra Masur of my staff, that John Jimison would be the coordinator of this project. The possibility of CRS contracting out to Mr. Robert Blum to do part of the work on this project was also discussed. It is my hope that Mr. Jimison will continue as coordinator of this project and that Mr. Blum's vast experience and expertise can also be effectively utilized by CRS.

Thank you very much for your cooperation and assistance.

Sincerely,

CHARLES H. PERCY,
U.S. Senator.
GEORGE MCGOVERN,
U.S. Senator.

EXCERPTS FROM A CRS REPORT ON A U.N. CONFERENCE ON ALTERNATE ENERGY AND AN INTERNATIONAL ALTERNATE ENERGY COMMISSION

Examine the concept proposed in the Resolution, and analyze whether such a conference would be worth holding, and/or an International Alternate Energy Commission should be established.

The primary conceptual goals of the resolution are clearly stated:

The United States should encourage the United Nations to hold a World Alternate Energy Conference in 1980 to consider ways to meet the world's energy needs through the development and use of alternate energy sources.

The goal of the Conference should be the establishment, under the auspices of the United Nations, of an International Alternate Energy Commission, comparable to the International Atomic Energy Agency, which would encourage the worldwide use of alternate energy sources by assisting in the dissemination of information and by other appropriate means

The first issue posed is perhaps crucial to the others: should a separate World Conference on Alternative Energy be encouraged at all?

A U.S. Conference on Science and Technology for Development is already formally endorsed and scheduled to be held August 1979, a conference which includes the topic of energy on its agenda. Preparatory work is well under way, including inventories of resources in each of the participating countries. Since attention will be given in this conference to alternative energy strategies, Congress may wish to use this forum, including the preparatory exchanges of information and ideas, to sound out the degree of interest on the part of other countries in a separate conference such as is proposed in the subject resolution.

Second, the U.S. and its allies and the LDC's recently concluded an extended series of confrontations in the forum of the Conference on International Cooperation (CIEC), which included discussions on energy held in Paris over a period of two years. The discussions, often acrimonious, produced a residue of ill will not easily dispelled, which any future conference involving the LDC's and energy would inherit as remembered history, unless a major turn of North-South Relations occurs between 1978 and the convening of such a conference.

Third, the United States has by no means resolved what is at best an ambivalent policy position regarding the role and deployment of alternative energy sources within its own economy. Until this ambivalence is resolved, U.S. initiatives encouraging other nations to use alternate energies could be viewed with suspicion or could otherwise negatively influence U.S. foreign economic and other foreign assistance policies.

On the other hand, assuming the desirability of creating an International Alternate Energy Commission, a case can well be made that launching it at a world conference would give every nation and group of nations a full and public opportunity to present facts, central interests, and organizational preferences. This would presumably create some additional trust and participation with respect to the eventual works of such commission. Further, a conference would serve as a world forum and attention magnet for the concepts of alternative energy.

It should be remembered that the conference was not intended to be an end and in itself; rather it was to serve as the means by which a new International Alternate Energy Commission would be established, a goal which could be pursued in other forums and by other means.

The key concept to be examined, therefore, would seem to be whether creation of a new international agency is the most appropriate or effective way to encourage and further the use of alternate energy sources.

The resolution language invokes the argument that:

[N]o international agency presently exists which assists countries to exchange information and technical assistance concerning energy-related problems, which disseminates information relating to alternate energy sources, or which promotes the use of alternate energy sources:

In point of fact, there are several international agencies which are currently engaged in assisting countries to exchange information and technical assistance, to provide capital and otherwise to promote the use of alternate energy sources, as a perhaps limited but expandable part of their respective missions. Among them are the International Energy Agency (IEA), the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD), and the International Development Association (IDA).

Congress recently authorized and required the U.S. foreign assistance agency (Agency for International Development) to give increased attention and support to "appropriate" technologies, including related alternative energy sources.

Any, or all of these assistance agencies could serve as the institutional channel for much stronger and more effective programs promoting accelerated use of energy alternative to fossil fuels and nuclear power.

These existing organizational options notwithstanding, a substantial case exists for establishing an entirely new international agency devoted to the purpose of promoting, developing, and expanding the use of alternate fuels.

Although the missions of these existing international organizations could be expanded to include promotion of alternate fuels, the orientation of their assistance programs up to now have been strongly aligned with large and capital intensive industrial and power producing projects and with economic programs designed to rely increasingly on fossil and nuclear fuels, fuels which are very unevenly distributed geographically and are owned and controlled by comparatively few of the nations of the world. Additionally, they all contribute in varying degrees to increasingly pollution of the air, water and the crop carrying capacity of the land.

In contrast, alternate energy sources intended to be promoted under the terms of the subject resolution—the sun, the wind, the natural processes of photosynthesis, and the tides and temperatures of the oceans and the seas—are less subject to national ownership and control. They appear relatively benign, nonpolluting, more evenly accessible to most of the nations of the world, are most efficient when decentrally deployed, used close to the energy consumption point.

The effective promotion and spread of the use of these particular fuels thus provides unique opportunities for more equitable and diversified distribution of alternative forms of energy and power. Depending on how the technologies and industrial capability to produce the equipment enabling their use are managed and deployed, the promotion of expanded use of these fuels may also bring about a more equal and diversified distribution of political and strategic power as well.

The international availability and the essentially non-political nature of these fuels serve to provide a quite substantial case for the creation of some wholly new international institutional focus and framework within which international public policies and programs can be jointly developed for their promotion and diffusion. They arguably offer the U.S. and the rest of the world a timely opportunity for fresh and even bold new energy strategies for peace.

THE NUCLEAR WASTE MANAGEMENT ACT OF 1978

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, yesterday I introduced legislation to establish a national policy on nuclear waste management, S. 3343. This legislation is being considered at hearings Tuesday through Thursday of this week before the Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Federal Services Subcommittee of Governmental Affairs.

I wish to thank Senator GLENN, chairman of the subcommittee, for his excellent work in arranging these hearings. I also wish to thank Senators MATHIAS and JAVITS for their support. I owe a special debt to Senator MATHIAS, who has pioneered in the area of nuclear waste disposal with his own legislation, S. 63. I am confident that Governmental Affairs can report out nuclear waste legislation this session based on the common efforts of those members interested in the topic.

Mr. President, a number of individuals in the Senate and the House, in the Federal Government, in industry and environmental groups, and elsewhere have contributed immeasurably to the preparation of my legislation. Of course, they do not all necessarily endorse this legislation. But I want to express my heartfelt thanks for their efforts on my behalf. I ask unanimous consent that a list of these individuals be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the information was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SENATE AND HOUSE STAFF

Leonard Weiss, Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Federal Services.
Sandy Spector, Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Federal Services.

EXPORTING SOLAR TECHNOLOGY EQUIPMENT TO THE THIRD WORLD

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, recently I requested the Congressional Research Service to compile a list of alternative means by which the Congress could assist U.S. business to export renewable energy technology equipment to developing nations. I believe the CRS study includes some valuable suggestions which I would like to share with my colleagues.

We have, in this country, developed, over the past several years, a small but significant solar industry which has begun to meet the energy needs of a growing number of homes across the country. This industry has not, however, even begun to tap the vast and lucrative markets which potentially exist in the Third World.

I believe that the expansion of our domestic solar industry into foreign markets is of vital importance to the domestic growth of this industry as well as the development aspirations of the Third World. Therefore, I requested CRB to do this brief paper.

In addition, earlier this year I introduced two pieces of legislation designed to encourage American solar technology exports. One bill (S. 2835) requires the Export-Import Bank to designate an officer to promote exports of renewable energy technology equipment. I am very pleased that the Senate Banking Committee saw fit to include this provision in its markup of the Export-Import Bank authorization (S. 2520). The other bill, (S. 2731), authorizes the Commerce Department to undertake a global market survey for American solar technology equipment. Unfortunately, this legislation has not, thus far, met with success. My distinguished colleague from Vermont, Senator LEAHY, is presently trying to assure that this survey gets sufficient funding in the Appropriations Committee; $460,000 is all that is needed. I intend to join my colleague on the Senate floor to fight for this funding.

Mr. President, our solar industry will inevitably take on greater importance as this country rethinks and reshapes its future energy needs. At the same time as this industry grows domestically, it can also develop into an important export industry. However, without the help of the Congress, this process could be slow and arduous. With our help, this important American industry could be a leader within the next few years in supplying solar equipment to rural and urban areas throughout the Third World. Mr. President, I call on all my colleagues to join with me in devising means to help this vital industry to export.

Mr. President, I ask that the "Ideas List" from CRS be printed in the RECORD at this time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IDEA LIST FOR SENATOR CHARLES PERCY: THINGS HE AND CONGRESS COULD DO TO GET U.S. BUSINESS TO DEVELOP AND EXPORT PRODUCTS AND SERVICES TO PROVIDE DEVELOPING COUNTRIES WITH ATTRACTIVE ALTERNATIVE SOURCES OF FUELS AND ENERGY

PREFACE

At a meeting with W. H. Donnelly, G. Holliday and W. Schacht of CRS, Christopher Palmer requested the preparation of a check list of ideas that might be considered by Senator Percy in addressing the question of what he and Congress could do to get U.S. businesses, particularly small ones, to develop and export products and services to provide developing countries with attractive alternative sources of fuels and energy. The following list responds to that request. It reflects the views and ideas of the three CRS participants.

I. THE RANGE OF CONGRESSIONAL ACTION

The range of action options open to Senator Percy and to the Congress include:

(1) Congressional inquiry through hearings that could look into the following:

(a) The present state of such exports, volume, trends, principal items, major recipients, method of financing.

(b) Obstacles and discouragements to business investment and venture in this field.

(c) Assessment and commentary upon proposals to do something to substantially expand these exports.

(2) Legislation to:

(a) Establish national goals and policy to this end.

(b) Assign responsibilities and authorities within the executive branch, and create or modify Federal organization.

(c) Authorize programs.

(d) Appropriate funds.

(e) Provide tax incentives.

(f) Remove or reduce legal deterrents, e.g., antitrust restrictions and discouraging patent policies.

(3) Oversight to:

(a) Get U.S. participants in the U.N. Conference to emphasize development and use of alternative energy sources.

(b) Make sure agencies quickly and effectively follow out any new congressional directions.

II. THE "BIG PICTURE", OR TOP-DOWN APPROACH

(1) Goals and purposes

Decide what are to be the goals and purposes of any government venture to foster U.S. exports of products and services for development of alternative energy sources. Questions to be answered in setting these goals include:

(a) Is the purpose mainly to increase U.S. exports, or is it to use these kinds of exports to some other end? If so, what is that end? Is it to be the goal to:

Help U.S. small business get into markets not available in the United States?

Help small business generally and increase U.S. jobs?

Reduce or limit the demand for oil by developing countries so the United States will face less competition for it in world markets?

Reduce developing country dependence on imported oil for the benefit of U.S. foreign policy objectives such as reduction of regional tensions, offset of Soviet influence, reduction of the risk of nuclear proliferation?

Provide a foreign testing ground for products and services that might sell in the United States?

(b) What is to be the role of big business? Will it be excluded or will it be permitted to take part?

(c) Would the goal apply equally to all developing countries, or more to some and less to others? If so, what be the basis for differences?

(d) Who would be the intended beneficiaries in the developing countries: the "dirt-poor" impoverished (the AID approach) or the existing industrial and commercial community (the Ex-Im Bank approach)?

(2) Financing

(a) How would financing of this project be divided between business and the Federal Government?

(b) Considering the present inflation, how much public subsidy would be justified, through tax incentives which would reduce Treasury income, or through direct or indirect benefit from appropriated funds?

(c) How effective are the ways of financing? What would be the most effective combination of them?

(d) How would the costs to the public purse compare with anticipated benefits: (i) financial, (ii) other? In particular, if alternative energy sources could be made more attractive than nuclear energy, to what extent would any unrecovered government outlay be justifiable as a non-proliferation premium? Would it be worth the cost?

(3) Factors to be considered

(a) The probable attitudes of key developing countries and the influence of these attitudes on other developing countries.

In particular, how likely are developing countries to feel that such a U.S. venture is intended to push them out of the world oil market so the United States can have easier access to it? Will the products and technologies be considered as second rate if they are not used in the United States?

(b) The ability of developing countries to pay for these imports.

(c) The timing. What results are desired, by when?

(d) The potential effect of GATT as limiting U.S. measures to promote such exports.

(e) The potential dampening effect of U.S. antitrust laws upon collaborative action by small business in developing and marketing these products. Is the goal worth a change in or exception to U.S. antitrust policy?

(f) The discouraging effect of U.S. patent policies upon those businesses that may receive Federal funds to develop such products and services.

(g) The nature and extent of present exports relating to alternative energy sources; their suppliers, the goals and plans of these suppliers.

(h) The ability of small business to quickly expand supply of a successful product or service.

(i) The ability of small business to provide adequate after-the-sale service to importers.

(j) The extent to which development and new product production could be carried on in the developing countries.

(k) The cost-effectiveness, for developing countries, of using alternative energy supply technologies rather than current ones.

(4) Some options affecting individual agencies

(a) The Department of Commerce

1. Provide special incentives to only this category of businesses, e.g., establish commercial energy agencies agents in the target developing countries; provide market analyses and trade intelligence; establish a Government Energy Trading Company to market and represent U.S. small energy business abroad; provide special consultation and training for small businesses wishing to engage in these exports.

2. Include or emphasize alternative energy technologies in current marketing assistance and information programs, e.g., foreign trade centers, trade and industrial exhibits, and trade missions.

(b) The Department of Energy

1. Establish energy experiment stations in developing countries, in collaboration with the host governments, to provide training, local research and development, and to represent small business exporters.

2. Establish a specific program to develop and demonstrate alternative energy sources attractive for developing countries.

(a) Designate one national laboratory as a focal point.

(b) Analyze pros and cons of making the DOE's Puerto Rico research center into a regional energy experiment station for Latin and South American participation.

(c) Emphasize contracts with those small businesses that show real intention and effort to enter into this export field, avoid spending Federal money in businesses that are simply job shopping with no plans to engage in exports.

3. Establish substantial prizes to small businesses that successfully develop and market such products or services in developing countries.

4. Authorize specific funds for these and related activities.

(c) The Department of State

1. Establish special energy attaches and supporting teams in developing countries both to provide market information to the United States and to help small businesses compete in foreign markets.

(d) The Department of the Treasury

1. Provide special tax incentives to small business engaged in developing and marketing in developing countries products and services for supply of energy from alternative sources. (Note, these incentives would not be available to other businesses.

(e) Export-Import Bank

1. Provide comparatively small loans, guarantees, etc., on a scale suitable for small business exports of these products and services. (Note, this may require congressional agreement to higher overhead costs of Ex-Im Bank.)

2. Fund projects more risky than it now will approve, if they are for alternative energy sources.

(f) Interagency coordination

1. Establish a strong, vital means of coordinating U.S. departments and agencies the function and programs of which support or affect development and export of products and services for alternative energy sources: Commerce, Ex-Im Bank, Justice, AID, etc.

III. THE GRASS ROOTS, OR BOTTOM UP APPROACH

Seek to stimulate interest in such exports through:

(1) Scheduling private meetings with business leaders and their associations.

(2) Sponsoring, promoting and organizing committees and conferences of the business community in support of the goal.

(3) Helping to obtain private funds (business, foundations) for workshops of academics, developing-country representatives, businessmen, U.S. financial interests, etc., to test out and promote support for this export idea.

HALTING CONSTRUCTION ON THE SEABROOK NUCLEAR PLANT

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, recently, construction on the Seabrook Nuclear Plant in New Hampshire was halted by an order of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. I think that the action taken in this matter was a mistake for two reasons. First of all, I feel it is detrimental to our Nation as a whole not to go ahead with the building of nuclear powerplants and the development of nuclear technology. I firmly believe that atomic energy is a part of our future. Through research and development of nuclear technology, we are making nuclear energy safe for future generations. For example, I recently announced on the floor of the Senate a technological breakthrough developed at Barnwell Nuclear Fuel Plant in South Carolina. This breakthrough concerned a new method of making the nuclear fuel cycle less susceptible to the threat that subnational groups could fashion crude nuclear explosives from the end products of that fuel cycle.

Mr. President, there is a second and very important reason why I am concerned about the halting of construction at Seabrook and that is the impact which this NRC order has on the jobs of a number of innocent people. Many workers went to New Hampshire expecting 8 solid years of work and were bitterly disappointed. The hardships which these people and their families are facing should not be ignored. An article published on July 24, in the Evening Post of Charleston, S.C., describes the impact which the stop-work order has had on employees of the Seabrook plant. The article tells of their frustration over the Federal Government's apparent inability to resolve what should be done with this new facility at Seabrook.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this article from the Evening Post be placed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NUCLEAR PLANT CLOSING LEAVES MANY JOBLESS

SEABROOK, N.H.—Hundreds of construction lamps still blaze through the night at the Seabrook atomic plant. But this week, many of the project's 1,800 workers, laid off when the site was closed, will crowd New England union halls looking for scarce jobs.

In the statehouse and in the offices of Public Service Co., other groups will gather to search for some way to overrule a federal order halting construction at the sprawling plant.

An eleventh hour attempt by labor unions to postpone a Nuclear Regulatory Commission stop-work order failed Friday just before the 6 p.m. deadline, when a U.S. District Court judge ruled the injunction was being sought in the wrong court.

Judge Louis Oberdofer dismissed the complaint, saying the matter should have been brought before the U.S. Court of Appeals.

The commission ordered the shutdown so a re-evaluation of the plant's location and of the system used to cool its twin-reactors could be made without the pressures of continuing construction.

Union and Public Service officials have told the workers repeatedly that the layoffs will be brief, but most workers say they are preparing for the worst.

"I'm like most of the other guys, I live from one paycheck to the next, and if that paycheck doesn't come, my family is in big trouble," said Tony Petre, a marine welder with three children.

"My wife and I talked about it all night. So I'll go down to the hall tomorrow and if there aren't any jobs, we'll pack up and move somewhere else."

Petre can afford to move from his Dover home. He has a highly skilled job that he says is "always in demand somewhere." He is living in a rented house with no lease.

Hundreds of others are not as lucky.

Workers who flocked to New England three years ago when the Seabrook project was announced came expecting eight solid years of work, many bought houses.

A large number, such as laborers, electricians and carpenters, say the job market is flooded with their skills and there is no place for them to go.

"I pour concrete, but so do a thousand other guys who are out of work," said a 34-year-old man from Manchester. "I've got a $44,000 mortgage on a house I just bought. I'll lose that house next month if Seabrook doesn't reopen because I know I can't find another job."

One worker who had heard the Nuclear Regulatory Commission had scheduled a prehearing conference Tuesday on alternative New England sites for the Seabrook plant said he was sure the plant would never be built.

"Hearings, appeals, law suits—all they do is talk," he said bitterly. "The country's out of oil, New England needs energy, I'm out of a job and instead of letting us build Seabrook and solve those problems, the government would rather talk."

RIGHT-OF-WAY PERMIT FOR PAC-TEX OIL PIPELINE

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, the Secretary of Interior has today approved the BLM right-of-way permit for the so-called "Pac-Tex" oil pipeline from Long Beach, Calif. to Midland, Tex.

This pipeline, the Senate will recall, was proposed by SOHIO several years ago as a means of transporting the Alaskan North Slope crude oil from the west coast to refineries in the central States. Completion of the Alaska pipeline has resulted in more oil being available to the west coast than the west coast refineries can process. This is due to increased production in California, from Elk Hills, and the Outer Continental Shelf, increased exports from Indonesia, and decreased demand in that State. The result is a surplus of oil—an excess over the refinery capacity for oil of the quality of Alaskan oil.

At present Alaskan oil is shipped in tankers through the Panama Canal, or around the southern tip of South America. This tanker shipment adds millions of dollars a year to our national energy cost.

I am very pleased by the Bureau of Land Management's granting of this permit. Any major project these days requires numerous Government approvals and the grant of the right-of-way is a major step in the approval of this pipeline. There are only two Federal permits remaining for this proposal. One is a Corps of Engineers water crossing permit and the other is an air quality permit from the Environmental Protection Agency. This EPA permit is dependent on approval of the State of California, since the law provides that it shall not issue until the more strict State laws have been complied with.

The delay in approving this much needed project must be laid on the officials in California, who have failed to approve this project. I understand that the permitting process in California is moving forward. I hope so and I hope it will be completed promptly. The importance of the SOHIO project cannot be understated. It is not only the first West to East oil transportation route but its completion will permit full production of the Prudhoe fields.

Until this "Pac-Tex" pipeline is built Alaskans face few alternatives. We can continue to sell our oil to the lower 48 and have the high transportation costs reduce its value. We can decrease production until the west coast surplus disappears, or we can arrange for exchanges of Alaskan oil with Japan. The exchanges would work as follows: Alaskan oil would be sold to refiners on our east coast, but would be shipped to Japan; Middle Eastern oil would be sold to Japanese refiners but delivered to our east coast refiners. The result would be no decrease in the oil available for our Nation and a transportation savings which ranges into about $100 million a year. Our dependence on foreign oil would not be increased, since we could reroute all the tankers in the event of a decrease in the supply from the mid-East. I have long advocated this solution—as a short-term answer to the present surplus of oil in California.

In short, Mr. President, I am pleased by the decision to grant the BLM right-of-way permit and I hope the other permits, including those from California, will be forthcoming soon. As required by the Pastore amendment, the benefits of Alaskan oil should be distributed throughout the country but not at a cost of economic waste. Without the West to East pipelines, the most economical and most sensible solution is a crude oil exchange with Japan. A recent New York Times editorial pointed out the logic of exporting Alaskan oil and, although I disagree that the law must be changed, it does present some point that I urge the Senate to consider. I therefore ask unanimous consent that it and the Secretary's press release be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ANDRUS APPROVES SOHIO PIPELINE RIGHT-OF-WAY GRANT

Secretary of the Interior Cecil D. Andrus announced today that he has approved issuance to the Standard Oil Company of Ohio (SOHIO) of the Federal right-of-way grant for 50 miles of new pipeline construction across public lands in California, Arizona, and New Mexico.

SOHIO's proposed 1,026-mile crude oil transportation system from Long Beach, California, to Midland, Texas, includes 238 miles of new pipeline construction. Some 50 miles of the system, in various segments, cross Federal public lands east of Whittier Narrows, California. All of these segments are covered by the right-of-way granted today.

Ed Hastey, California State Director for the Bureau of Land Management and Interior's authorized officer for construction compliance and monitoring of the pipeline system, will sign the grant today in Sacramento in the presence of company executives after receiving agreement on the stipulations.

"The SOHIO pipeline proposal is the key to an effective response to the buildup of crude oil surplus on the West Coast," Andrus said. "We need to move ahead as rapidly as possible to provide for west to east transport of oil to refineries with the capacity to handle it. Our intensive studies of the SOHIO proposal have shown that the pipeline is in the national interest. It can serve as conduit for oil coming not only from Alaska but expected to come on stream from Elk Hills production; from the California Outer Continental Shelf; and from California state tidelands leases."

"Stipulations accompanying the right-of-way grant in the new construction areas," Hastey said, "specify that the Federal authorization is contingent upon SOHIO's compliance with all necessary State and local regulations and permitting requirements."

No notice to actually proceed with construction would be issued to SOHIO until the company had complied with all necessary requirements of all permitting agencies, whether Federal, State, or local, Hastey said.

SOHIO's proposed marine terminal in Long Beach, California, where ocean-going American tankers would offload Prudhoe Bay crude oil from Valdez, Alaska, requires Federal authorization from the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers and several other Federal agencies, as well as State and local permits which are still being processed.

Today's authorization covers one of three separate phases of the pipeline system: a right-of-way grant across Federal public lands within the 238 miles of new construction in California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas. Permits for change in use from natural gas to oil on 120 miles of existing Southern California Gas Company pipeline right-of-way and 669 miles of existing El Paso

Natural Gas Pipeline Company pipeline right-of-way would be granted at a later date. SOHIO would be owner and operator of the new pipeline construction portions, while Southern California Gas and El Paso Natural Gas Companies would retain ownership in their respective lines, with SOHIO as the designated operator.

Hastey said Interior approval of the project had been based on an extensive environmental and economic study of the proposal and the geographic area which it would affect, as well as all feasible and reasonable alternatives. A Federal Environmental Impact Statement prepared by BLM was released in May 1977, and approved by the Council on Environmental Quality. In preparing the EIS, BLM requested and received comments from many agencies of Federal, State and local government, as well as private citizens and organizations.

BLM found that most of the direct environmental impacts of the project on Federal resources would be short-term, or could be mitigated through special stipulations which have been placed in the Federal grant. The Department and the Bureau both recognize that most of the controversial issues surrounding the project were based on projected air quality impacts in the Los Angeles Basin from the proposed Long Beach Marine Terminal and should, therefore, be dealt with specifically by State and local governments, not Federal land management agencies.

Hastey said today's action was the first step in project implementation, but that construction would not and could not begin until he had issued a Notice to Proceed to SOHIO. This will not be done, he said, until all operating agreements and stipulation requirements have been met to the Bureau's satisfaction.

Project implementation is now expected to deliver 500,000 barrels a day of crude oil to the West Coast with the bulk of its being shipped eastward and to the midwest and the remainder to the Los Angeles market.

HOW TO GET OIL BY SELLING OIL

Imports now account for about 40 percent of the oil consumed in the United States. That is slightly less than last year, but enough to put our international trade balance deeply in the red and—more important—leave us vulnerable to another Arab embargo. A tough energy program to reduce consumption remains the only long-term response to this dependence. However, as recent reports of the disappointing oil production in Alaska suggest, minor changes in Federal regulations could sharply increase domestic production and reduce the trade deficit within a few years. A shrewd program for greater self-sufficiency begins, paradoxically, with oil exports.

The key to the paradox lies in the West Coast's current oil glut. Completion of the Alaska pipeline last year greatly increased the amount of domestic oil available, but there is no market for much of it on the West Coast and no pipeline to send the excess to needy refineries in the Midwest. Instead of paying the exorbitant cost of shipping excess supplies eastward through the Panama Canal, producers are leaving it in the ground. At the present rate, oil production in Alaska and California by the early 1980's will be at least a million barrels a day below capacity.

The quickest, most effective means of stimulating that production would be to offer the oil companies a lucrative new market: the Far East. By changing the law to allow oil exports, the United States could sell its extra oil to Japan, then turn around and use the foreign currency thus earned to pay for some of the necessary imports to the East Coast. Japan, which is now heavily dependent on Middle East oil supplies, would be delighted, not only by the alternate source of supply but also by the opportunity to even out its trade accounts with the United States. The United States would not only reduce a huge trade deficit with Japan through the next decade or two but would also reduce its dependence on the oil of the Middle East. The total American oil imports would not be affected, but the available domestic supply in case of emergency would have been enlarged. In the event of an Arab embargo, Japan-bound oil could, if necessary, be diverted to higher-priority use.

If exporting oil is so desirable, why has the White House been reluctant to ask Congress for permission? Primarily because the President expects opposition from House members who suspect the motives of the oil companies. A ban on exports was written into the Alaska pipeline law to allay Congressional fears that the new oil would be diverted to more profitable markets overseas. The export plan would indeed induce production precisely because foreign sales would be profitable. But the oil companies' gains are not, in this case, the consumer's loss. We all stand to benefit from a reduced trade deficit and a greater capacity to withstand an embargo.

There is always the danger that O.P.E.C. would reduce production to offset the added flow of Alaskan oil. In this sense, however, Alaskan oil is no different than oil from the North Sea or the coast off New Jersey. Every move toward stimulating greater production among O.P.E.C.'s customers can be interpreted as a threat to the cartel. Considering the alternatives, we have little choice but to strive to reduce our dependence on O.P.E.C. while also using political and economic influence to contain its power.

A more significant objection has been that exports might discourage pipeline construction to the Midwest. It is not clear that a brand new pipeline should in fact be built; the national interest is well served by selling oil to Japan. But if we did choose this expensive project, it would be easy enough to guarantee the pipeline a good supply of oil by limiting the exports to surpluses beyond its capacity.

Self-sufficiency in energy is going to be hard to achieve with the best of efforts. With real sacrifices still to be made, it would be folly to bypass so simple and painless a step toward that goal.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STONE). The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the Senator from Florida (Mr. STONE) as a congressional advisor to the official delegation to the second session of the U.S.-ASEAN Dialog, to be held in Washington, D.C., August 2–4, 1978.

The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the following Senators to the delegation to the U.S.S.R. parliamentary visit, to be held in Moscow, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, November 1978: The Senator from North Dakota (Mr. BURDICK), the Senator from Missouri (Mr. EAGLETON), the Senator from Illinois (Mr. STEVENSON), the Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN), the Senator from Georgia (Mr. NUNN), the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN), the Senator from Ohio (Mr. GLENN), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER), the Senator from Oregon (Mr. PACKWOOD), the Senator from Nevada (Mr. LAXALT), and the Senator from Rhode Island (Mr. CHAFEE).

AMERICAN ACTIVISM SPEAKS TO THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, this summer thousands of Americans have demonstrated their concern for human rights. In June, college students on campuses across the country held demonstrations and rallies denouncing apartheid in South Africa. Early in July, over 60,000 people marched from the Washington Monument to the Capitol calling upon the Congress to extend the ratification date for the equal rights amendment. Just last week, thousands of native Americans and their supporters completed "The Longest March," an historic cross-country journey to demonstrate and rally nationwide support for American Indians. And, of course, in recent weeks, unprecedented numbers of our constituents wrote to us of their outrage at the trial of Anatoly Scharansky in the Soviet Union.

Through these actions, the American people have clearly proved that their concern for humanity is more than mere rhetoric. Americans are sending a clear message to Congress, and as U.S. Senators we must listen and act responsively. Mr. President, Americans strongly support universal human rights, and they are demanding immediate action.

But what has the Senate done to further human rights this summer? While we continually denounce foreign regimes that callously disregard human rights, have we translated our words into actions? We have passed numerous resolutions, but are they worth much more than the paper they are printed on? I do not think so, and it is certainly time for action.

Some have questioned what the Senate can actually do for universal human rights. We can begin, Mr. President, with the most fundamental right—the right to live—and we can act immediately by ratifying the United Nations Genocide Convention. First transmitted to the Senate in 1949, the convention outlaws and punishes the crime of genocide under international law. It guarantees to every citizen of the world the right to live securely regardless of their race, ethnicity, nationality, or religious beliefs.

By ratifying the Genocide Treaty the Senate will demonstrate to the American people, and to the world, that we are deeply committed to international human rights, and, more importantly, that we are willing to act on our convictions. Mr. President, I urge my fellow Senators to fulfill their obligations as the elected representatives of the American people, and as concerned human beings, by ratifying this crucial human rights document.

NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 2777.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives announcing its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2777) to provide for consumers a further means of minimizing the impact of inflation and economic depression by narrowing the price spread between costs to the producer and the consumer of needed goods, services, facilities, and commodities through the development and funding of specialized credit sources for, and technical assistance to, self-help, not-for-profit cooperatives, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PROXMIRE. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the request of the House for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. BROOKE, and Mr. TOWER, conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSING AND COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives on S. 3084.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3084) to amend and extend certain Federal laws relating to housing, community, and neighborhood development and preservation, and related programs, and for other purposes.

(The amendment of the House is printed in the RECORD of July 24, 1978, beginning at page 22306.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House, agree to the conference requested by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair, be authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. TOWER, and Mr. GARN conferees on the part of the Senate.

PRESERVING ALASKAN WILDS—NO LOCK-UP

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Energy and Natural Resources Committee is now reviewing one of the most important and far-reaching environmental bills ever to come before the Senate: the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

This measure deserves the overwhelming support it won when it passed the House of Representatives on May 19 by a vote of 277 to 31. It is a reasonable, balanced bill that will protect Alaska's greatest natural resources while insuring ample opportunity for economic growth in that State.

I am concerned about the often repeated criticism by opponents of this bill that it will "lock-up" Alaska's vast energy and mineral resources and prevent their future development. A careful analysis of the Alaska lands legislation reveals that nothing could be further from the truth. According to data compiled by the U.S. Geological Survey, fully 95 percent of Alaska's most favorable oil and gas deposits lie completely outside of the conservation boundaries proposed by this bill. Nothing in this bill would prohibit potential development of such reserves not included in the proposed national interest lands withdrawals.

The Alaska lands bill will also have a negligible impact on hard rock mining. Here again, most potential mineral lands have been excluded from the carefully drawn withdrawal proposals. It must be kept in mind that there has been no significant hard rock mining in Alaska for the past four decades simply because extraction costs are so high and the distance from commercial markets is so great. Even in areas of potential future conflict, economic realities preclude the likelihood of serious mining activity. This situation is not likely to change in the foreseeable future.

Mr. President, more than two-thirds of Alaska, including State and Native selections and other Federal lands outside the proposed conservation units, will remain open to possible development following enactment of this legislation. There is no justification for opposing the Alaska Lands Act as a "lockup" of Federal energy and mineral resources. According to a recent analysis by the Joint Federal-State Land Use Planning Commission for Alaska, passage of this legislation "would not have a significant impact on the availability of timber, oil, and gas, and mineral resources to the Nation." With regard to the economic impact of this bill, the Commission concluded that:

> The overall impact of H.R. 39 and S. 1500 on the State and national economies would be at most relatively minor.

I consider it a privilege to be one of the original cosponsors of the Senate version of the Alaska Lands bill now pending in the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. This legislation has received strong editorial support in my home State of Wisconsin. A May 24 editorial in the Sheboygan Press underscores the reasons why my colleagues should join me in support of this outstanding measure to preserve Alaskan lands for the future generations of Americans.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Sheboygan Press editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PRESERVING ALASKAN WILDS

The bill to create millions of acres of federal park land in Alaska was passed Friday by the House on a 277 to 31 vote. The two Alaskan senators, however, threaten a filibuster when the bill reaches the Senate.

Their threat, and the opposition of mining and timber interests, building trades unions, and state government leaders in Alaska, make Senate passage of the bill this year uncertain.

The strong House support, including six of the Wisconsin delegation, may counter some of that opposition.

Also, there is optimism because the bill excludes 70 percent of mineral lands from the park system and leaves all of the highly potential oil and gas lands open to development.

This fact should weaken the opposition of special interest groups that are hoping to exploit Alaska's natural resources.

The bill is consistent with national park policy initiated when Yellowstone Park was created in 1872, and the national forest system created by President Theodore Roosevelt in the early 1900s. It is unthinkable that any U.S. citizen would want to undo those actions.

The parks, wildernesses, refuges and preserves designated in the Alaska bill are scattered throughout the state, from the rain forests in the southeast to the frozen tundra in the far north. Existing parks are expanded in some cases. The state is so large and has so many resources outside the proposed parkland that Alaskans will have countless opportunities to improve their economy. There appears to be no need to exploit the areas designated for preservation.

Plans have been made by the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee to mark up the House-passed bill in June or July. The hope is that in the meantime opponents will see the need for preserving Alaska's resources.

SENATE RESOLUTION 528—RESOLUTION COMMENDING LARGO, FLA., SENIOR HIGH SCHOOL'S WORLD MUSIC CONTEST AWARD

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I send a resolution to the desk and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD). The clerk will state the resolution by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 528) commending Largo, Florida Senior High School's first-place award in the World Music Contest in The Netherlands.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the resolution be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. STONE. This resolution is a resolution which salutes a Florida band which has just won a world championship in The Netherlands in musicianship and for its skills and talents.

This resolution has been fully cleared on both sides of the aisle.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution (S. Res. 528), together with its preamble is as follows:

Whereas the Largo Senior High School "Band of Gold" has just returned to Florida from Kerkrabe, the Netherlands, after capturing first place in the World Music Contest;

Whereas this was the first time in the 28-year history of the contest that a final overall award has been presented, and the first time that a single band has won three separate gold medals, in concert, show and marching categories; and

Whereas this is a competition of the highest international reputation, bringing together the most talented and disciplined musicians from over 250 bands representing 26 countries: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the United States Senate commends the unparalleled accomplishments of these gifted young people; recognizes the efforts and support of their Director Robert R. Cotter, their parents and their school in making these achievements possible; and expresses its appreciation for the inestimable service this band has provided in so honorably representing its community, its state and its country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to reconsider is laid on the table.

The Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER).

NORTHWEST AIRLINES FINANCIAL POSITION IN THE CURRENT STRIKE

Mr. MELCHER. Mr. President, I salute the present occupant of the chair and regretfully report to the Senate at this late hour of 10:05 p.m. the most recent developments in the regrettable Northwest Airlines strike which affects so much of the Northwest of the United States.

The strike has been going on for 85 or 86 days. It has had a serious impact on my State of Montana and all the other States served by Northwest Airlines.

(Mr. STONE assumed the chair.)

I must also acknowledge that Northwest Airlines is a first-class airline, of major magnitude and of great strength in relationship to other airlines in this country. It is an airline of great importance to Montana and the Northwest. It has contributed significantly to our economy.

However, under the airlines mutual aid pact formula, Northwest Airlines on strike since April 29, has as of today collected $90.4 million from the pact member airlines for not flying its scheduled routes while on strike. And that hurts.

During the past 8 years when Northwest Airlines has had five labor disputes, five strikes, the carrier has historically made a profit during these strikes because of the financial crutch available to the carrier through the mutual aid pact.

The Civil Aeronautics Board computes the mutual aid payments by the other MAP pact carriers to Northwest Airlines during the current strike to be $6.5 million per week and currently $927,000 per day.

In the first quarter of 1978, Northwest Airlines reported a $16.6 million net profit compared with $12.2 million for the same same period in 1977.

I point this out to the Senate to make the comparison between the years of 1978 airline earnings, specifically Northwest earnings, as compared to 1977 and this year.

Under the Civil Aeronautics Board requirements of reporting tentative net profits on a monthly basis which are updated and reconfirmed by a carrier in its quarterly net profit statement, Northwest Airlines has reported for the month of April 1978 a tentative net income of $8.3 million compared with a $6.2 million net income for the same period in 1977. The net income for May of 1977 was $4.7 million, and that, Mr. President, becomes critical in consideration of the following:

It should be noted that the Northwest Airlines strike began April 29, and only 2 days of the April report are days covered when the carrier was on strike. The May net profit figure can be anticipated to be in the millions of dollars, even though the strike was on all during the month, although Northwest flies only a few flights with management pilots and pilots not observing the strike.

The profits for the month of May will probably be substantial, and will be derived from the mutual aid fund.

Mr. President, what I now have to report is very disturbing to me and I am certain will be disturbing to my colleagues.

Under Civil Aeronautics Board rules, a carrier is required to report its financial and traffic figures within 30 days from the end of the reporting month.

Northwest Airlines is now overdue, since July 1, in reporting its financial figures to the Civil Aeronautics Board for the month of May.

These figures are very important as they are the first full month of the current Northwest Airlines strike. The June figures will be due August 1, only a few days from now.

Because the May figures have not been reported, the Civil Aeronautics Board has turned over this noncompliance, this violation of law based on CAB rules, to its Bureau of Enforcement, requesting that Northwest Airlines take steps to collect the overdue May figures and submit them to the CAB as required by law.

Mr. Donald Nyrop, chairman of the Board, Northwest Airlines, states that the May report is not ready because they do not have enough people on board during the strike to compute the May earnings. He further states that he expects to file the normal 2nd quarter report in the first part of August.

Mr. President, I point out that this is a violation of law, that the CAB is attempting to enforce the law to get the report, and that there is obviously a reluctance on the part of Northwest to submit their proper earnings during that particular month of May, on which they were on strike during the entire month, to perhaps avoid demonstrating that their profits are substantial. It will be important to note for the CAB and for the Senate, for the House, and for the public to ascertain whether those profits are indeed as great as or greater than those profits received during the identical month of May in the year 1977 when the airline was not on strike. Obviously, if the amount is greater, it is the result of the mutual aid pact, the agreement between airlines to pay each other while they are on strike and not flying, and which I believe, Mr. President, is contrary to the public interest.

I yield back the remainder of my time and I thank the Chair.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Energy, Nuclear Proliferation, and Federal Services of the Governmental Affairs Committee be authorized to meet on Tuesday, August 1, 1978, at 2 p.m., in room 3302, for the purpose of marking up S. 3229, the Postal Service Amendments Act of 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider nominations on the Executive Calendar, all of which, I believe, have been cleared.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, all of the nominations have been cleared on our side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the nominations.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations be considered en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

THE JUDICIARY

Edward S. Smith, of Maryland, to be an Associate Judge of the U.S. Court of Claims.

Jose A. Gonzalez, Jr., of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Eugene Madden, Jr., of New York, to be U.S. marshal for the northern district of New York for the term of 4 years.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Omi Gail Walden, of Georgia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Energy (Conservation and Solar Applications).

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move, en bloc, to reconsider the votes by which the nominations were confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I make that motion.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration of legislative business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION OF SENATOR DOMENICI TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the two leaders have been recognized, the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes before the Senate proceeds to the consideration of the conference report on the New York City bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 10 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, if there be no further business to come before the Senate, I move, at this moment, 16 minutes after 10 o'clock on the evening of Wednesday, July 26, 1978, that the Senate stand in recess until the hour of 10 o'clock tomorrow morning, July 27, 1978.

The motion was agreed to; and at 10:16 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, July 27, 1978, at 10 a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate July 26, 1978:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Eugene Madden, Jr., of New York, to be U.S. marshal for the northern district of New York for the term of 4 years.

DEPARTMENT OF ENERGY

Omi Gail Walden, of Georgia, to be an Assistant Secretary of Energy (Conservation and Solar Applications).

The above nominations were approved subject to the nominees' commitments to respond to requests to appear and testify before any duly constituted committee of the Senate.

THE JUDICIARY

Edward S. Smith, of Maryland, to be an associate judge of the U.S. Court of Claims.

Jose A. Gonzalez, Jr., of Florida, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of Florida.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, July 26, 1978

The House met at 10 a.m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT).

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 26, 1978.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore for today.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Lord, Thou hast been our dwelling place in all generations. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the Earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God.—Psalms 90: 1, 2.

Eternal Father, who hast been our dwelling place in all generations, our fathers called unto Thee and Thou didst hear them and delivered them from their fears. Give us to know that as Thou wast with them so art Thou with us to guide us on our way and to lead us in Thy way. Strengthen us in the hour of temptation, sustain us in the time of trouble, support us in periods of trial, and lead us in the ways of peace. Uphold us in our efforts to make this a better world and to bring good will to all Thy children.

In the midst of this day's work assure us of Thy presence and let the light of Thy wisdom fall upon our pathway: for Thy name's sake. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 6900. An act to amend the National Trails System Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 919), as amended, to designate the Oregon National Historic Trail and Travelway as a unit of the National Trails System.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill and concurrent resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 3153. An act to settle Indian land claims within the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, and for other purposes; and

S. Con. Res. 98. Concurrent resolution relating to adjournment to a date certain during the remainder of the 95th Congress.

REREFERRAL OF H.R. 10189, PERMITTING SUITS UNDER SECTION 1983 OF TITLE 42, UNITED STATES CODE, TO COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. EDWARDS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 10189, to permit suits under section 1983 of title 42, United States Code, be rereferred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

If this bill had been reported by the House Committee on the Judiciary, it would have been subject to a sequential referral. Without establishing a precedent for future referrals, I ask that it be rereferred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

COMMODITY EXCHANGE ACT EXTENSION AND AMENDMENTS

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 10285) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, for 4 years.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 362, nays 2, answered "present" 1, not voting 67, as follows:

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 10285, with Mr. McHUGH (Chairman pro tempore) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. When the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union rose on Tuesday, July 25, 1978, the Clerk had read through line 16 on page 9. Are there any further amendments to section 2?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CUSTOMER FUNDS AND PROPERTY

SEC. 3. Section 4d(2) of the Commodity Exchange Act (17 U.S.C. 6d(2)) is amended by inserting after "Provided further," in the first paragraph the following: "That in accordance with such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe by rule, regulation, or order, such money, securities, and property of the customers of such futures commission merchant may be commingled and deposited as provided in this section with any other money, securities, and property received by such futures commission merchant and required by the Commission to be separately accounted for and treated and dealt with as belonging to the customers of such futures commission merchant: And provided further,".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 3 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 3?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTRATION OF FUTURE COMMISSION MERCHANTS AND FLOOR BROKERS

SEC. 4. Section 4(f)(1) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6f(1)) is amended by striking out in the third sentence "All registrations shall expire on the 31st day of December of the year for which issued" and inserting in lieu thereof "Each registration shall expire on the 31st day of December of the year for which issued or at such other time not less than one year from the date of issuance, as the Commission may by rule, regulation, or order prescribe".

TECHNICAL AMENDMENT

SEC. 5. Section 4g(3) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6g(3)) is amended by striking out "Brokers" and inserting in lieu thereof "Floor brokers".

REGISTRATION OF ASSOCIATED PERSONS

SEC. 6. The third sentence of section 4k(2) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6k(2)) is amended to read as follows: "Such registration shall expire two years after the effective date thereof or at such other time, not less than one year from the date of issuance thereof, as the Commission may by rule, regulation, or order prescribe, and shall be renewed upon application therefor unless the registration has been suspended (and the period of such suspension has not expired) or revoked after notice and hearing as prescribed in section 6(b) of this Act: Provided, That upon initial registration, unless the Commission otherwise prescribes by rule, regulation, or order, the effective period of such registration shall be not more than two years nor less than one year from the effective date thereof.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 4, section 5, and section 6 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 6?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTRATION OF COMMODITY TRADING ADVISERS AND COMMODITY POOL OPERATORS

SEC. 7. Section 4n of the Commodity Exchange Act (17 U.S.C. 6n) is amended by—

(1) striking out in subsection (2) "thirty days" and inserting in lieu thereof "six months";

(2) striking out "All registrations" in subsection (3) and inserting in lieu thereof "Each registration"; and

(3) inserting after "year," in subsection (3) "or at such other time, not less than one year from the effective date thereof, as the Commission may by rule, regulation, or order prescribe,".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 7 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there amendments to section 7?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROHIBITION OF FRAUDULENT TRANSACTIONS

SEC. 8. Section 4o(1) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 60(1) is amended by striking out "registered under this Act".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 8 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 8?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARBITRATION BY REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATION

SEC. 9. Section 5a of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 7a(11)) is amended by inserting in subsection (11) after "otherwise" the following: "(such as by delegation to a registered futures association having rules providing for such procedures)".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 9 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY OF ILLINOIS

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY of Illinois: On page 12, after line 10 add the following section and renumber subsequent sections accordingly:

CLARIFICATION OF INDEPENDENT CLEARING ORGANIZATIONS' STATUS

SEC. 10. Section 5a(12) of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding at the end of the section:

A clearinghouse established as a separate legal entity from a contract market shall submit to the Commission for approval its by-laws, rules, regulations and resolutions relating to the clearing of trades for its contract market. Such approval shall be subject to all of the provisions of this paragraph pertaining to Commission approval of the by-laws, rules, regulations or resolutions of contract markets. However, such a clearinghouse shall not be considered a contract market for any purpose under this act.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the Commission has asserted that clearing organizations, even though they may be separate entities from the exchanges which they serve, are "contract markets" for purposes of section 5a(12) of the Commodity Exchange Act. This section provides for the Commission approval of all bylaws, rules, regulations, and resolutions of contract markets relating to futures contracts or other trading requirements.

Of the 10 contract markets currently designated by the Commission, 6 have independent clearing organizations. Their record has been remarkably trouble free. Indeed, no loss has ever been suffered as a result of a default in a trade cleared through such an organization.

While Commission review of clearinghouse rules and bylaws does not by itself pose an insurmountable problem, the other implications of being treated as a contract market threaten the orderly functioning and objectivity of independent clearing organizations. For example, the Commission could require such a clearing organization to duplicate all of the costly surveillance, auditing, and enforcement procedures currently required of the exchanges.

It is unnecessary to expose each independent clearing organization to additional regulation as a contract market. Clearing organizations efficiently perform an extremely valuable mechanical function for the futures markets by clearing all trades on a daily basis and guaranteeing performance of all futures contracts, both to the buyer and to the seller. They do not, however, play a role in the matters which are subject to the Commission's regulations, such as the manner of trading, the segregation of customer funds, and the terms of futures contracts.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I am asking that my amendment to exempt the clearinghouse organization from Commission regulation be adopted.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We have had an opportunity on this side to review the amendment being offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MURPHY) and find no objection to it whatsoever.

As the gentleman has pointed out, there is no history of any difficulty with the clearing corporations, and in fact we understand that at a future date the Commission may choose to exempt them by regulation of the Commission anyway.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think it is a good amendment, and I will support it.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the clearinghouse function is an essential function in the contract market, and the Commission has issued regulations which extend its scope of remedial authority over clearinghouses, whether they are an integral part of the contract market or separated into a separate corporation.

In 41 Code of Federal Regulations, 40093, the following statement appears:

[t]he Act imposes a basic duty upon contract markets to insure the integrity of the contracts for which they are designated and gives the Commission broad regulatory power to oversee contract market efforts in this area. . . . As mentioned above, the clearing of trades is the essence of the integrity of a futures contract and a necessary prerequisite to designation as a contract market. A contract market cannot avoid Commission regulation of this or any other essential contract market function by delegating that function either directly or indirectly, to separate organizations. . . .

Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MURPHY) would do is allow those clearinghouses, which are separate organizations, to be exempt from any regulatory authority of the Commission, other than the approval of rules and regulations. That seems to me to create a dangerous precedent. I do not reflect in this statement any criticism of a particular clearinghouse in Chicago, but the problem will arise if essential contract functions can be spun off into separate corporations, thus allowing those corporations to be exempt from Commission regulation.

It is important that the Commission not only approve the rules and regulations of the clearinghouses, as they do for contract markets generally, but also that they have the remedial authority to take care of any problems which may arise.

Mr. Chairman, I strongly urge my colleagues to reject this amendment.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the committee chairman this question: The clearinghouses are subject to the rules and regulations of the exchanges which they serve, are they not?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. And those exchanges in turn will be subject to the regulation of the Commission. So there will be a supervisory role played by the Commission through the exchange over these clearinghouses.

Mr. FOLEY. It would be an indirect one, though.

Mr. Chairman, I think the purpose the gentlemen seeks to accomplish is to provide that a clearinghouse, which is a separate corporation, would be subject to Commission approval of its rules and regulations, but not be subject to the same degree of regulation by Commission as an exchange, while another exchange which included the clearinghouse function in its own corporate scope would be subject to direct Commission regulation.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, what the gentleman from Illinois attempts to do is this:

We have heard a lot lately about the duplication of effort and paperwork imposed upon industry by Washington. What we are doing here by transferring these clearinghouse regulations to the individual exchanges is eliminating the duplication of providing regulations and submitting duplicative audits and inspections to the Commission, because the same supervisory effort is conducted by the exchanges which the clearinghouse serves.

So we are really duplicating efforts. I think the cry has gone up around the country that there is enough paperwork and regulation emanating from Washington. All we are doing here is duplicating another function that is already taken care of by the exchange which in turn is regulated by the Commission.

Mr. FOLEY. I do not want to be sarcastic, but this particular clearinghouse is not exactly a struggling small business overburdened with Federal regulations to the point that it has difficulty clearing a profit. The fact of the matter is that six of the clearinghouses are separate corporations and four of them are operated by existing exchanges. There seems to be no reason for us to provide that, if a decision is made to set up a separate clearinghouse corporation, that corporation should be treated differently than a clearinghouse which is part of the clearinghouse exchange. I think it is a bad precedent, and I hope the committee members will reject it.

The Commission strongly opposes the adoption of this amendment, and I would like to quote, briefly, from the Commission's letter to me, signed by Gary L. Seevers, Vice Chairman:

We understand that the proposed amendment would provide that clearinghouse rules be submitted to the Commission for its review and approval under Section 5a(12) of the Act but that the Commission would have no further regulatory jurisdiction over clearinghouses. Thus, while the Commission could review rules of such an association, the Commission would not have the express power to take remedial action against contract markets or clearinghouses for failure to enforce these rules.

Since clearinghouses perform vital functions, and have a substantial impact upon the financial integrity of contract markets, it would be inappropriate to carve out an exemption for these entities which would make it impossible for the Commission effectively to regulate the performance of clearinghouses with respect to those matters other than review of clearinghouse rules. Preservation of the Commission's authority over the activities of clearinghouses is consistent with Congress' desire, as expressed in 1974, that the CFTC exercise strong oversight and monitoring with respect to all activities involving a board of trade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has indicated the particular exchange in Chicago is a successful exchange and thereby should have no hesitation about being regulated. I really do not think that is a sound reason. But I would like to ask the gentleman, if it is within his knowledge, this question: Has there ever been a default or any threat of scandal from any clearinghouse that the gentleman knows of?

Mr. FOLEY. I am not personally aware of any. If I can respond to the gentleman, I do not think that this would indicate that regulatory authority should be removed. The presence of regulation is always a healthy inducement to any organization to comply with the law.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, might I also ask the gentleman this question: The Commission would have power if, down through the years, they may, by their own regulation, exempt these clearinghouses if, after custom and practice, they find that the clearinghouses are adhering to the regulations. Might they exempt them on their own order?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes. The Commission has full authority under the act to exempt a clearinghouse from any rules that it makes with respect to these contract markets, and the Commission is authorized to treat different exchanges in different ways as they determine the needs of enforcement require.

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. The clearing operation is one of the most critical functions involved in a futures trade. Clearinghouses perform vital functions which have a substantial impact on the financial integrity of the contract markets they serve. This is true whether the clearing organizations are separate, independent corporations, or whether they are part of the exchange.

This amendment would leave the CFTC without sufficient authority to regulate all the aspects of a futures trade. The CFTC would have the ability to rievew clearinghouse rules but its power to take remedial action against contract markets or clearinghouses for failure to enforce these rules could be questioned. The CFTC has not acted irresponsibly with this authority and has recommended against the amendment.

For these reasons I urge my colleagues to oppose this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MURPHY).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. A'COIN

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. AUCOIN: Page 12, after line 10, insert the following new section:

PROCESS FOR APPROVAL OF BYLAWS, RULES, REGULATIONS, AND RESOLUTIONS OF CONTRACT MARKETS

SEC. 10. Section 5a(12) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 7a(12)) is amended by—

(1) inserting after the first sentence the following: "At least 30 days before approving any such bylaws, rules, regulations, and resolutions of economic significance, the Commission shall publish in the Federal Register a copy of such bylaws, rules, regulations, and resolutions. The Commission shall give interested persons an opportunity to participate in the approval process through submission of written data, views or arguments; and

(2) striking out "the Commission shall approve, within thirty days" and inserting in lieu thereof "after consideration of the relevant matter presented, the Commission shall approve within sixty days".

Redesignate the subsequent sections accordingly.

Mr. AUCOIN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. AUCOIN. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, this amendment is designed to clarify the powers of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission in overseeing the various rules and regulations submitted to it for approval by contract markets across the country.

It would simply require that a 30-day public notice be given in advance of adopting rules that involve major economic significance.

Mr. Chairman, this is necessary in order to bring openness and adequate public knowledge to the Commission's major rulemaking and decisions. I think it is important in all major decisions that the public and all parties affected by those decisions have full knowledge of those rules as they are proposed and in advance of their adoption.

That is a fundamental premise behind sound regulation. It is a fundamental premise behind sound government.

Mr. Chairman, among the many responsibilities assigned to the Commission under the Commodities Exchange Act, section 5(a) places an oversight responsibility on the Commission to review and to sanction all changes that are proposed in the rules, the regulations, and the bylaws which govern the operation of contract markets. Many of the notifications approved by this Commission are technical and rather noncontroversial.

However, there are a number of proposed rule changes that are controversial because of their expected impact on the way a particular commodity is traded or on the broader effects that a change may bring about in the production and distribution of that commodity. It is to these more controversial rule changes that my amendment is addressed.

Despite the permissiveness of the current law, neither the Commodity Exchange Act itself, nor the regulations that accompany it, have in practice provided for adequate public involvement, participation, or surveillance in the administrative procedures that govern the Commission's oversight function. Under current procedures, there is no requirement for the posting of public notice of a proposed rule change or an opportunity for an aggrieved party to offer views or arguments on the effect of proposed rules.

This situation is disturbing when one considers that the Commission is a public agency charged with insuring that the public interest is adequately served and protected in rules and regulations promulgated by the private contract markets. It is quite certain, for instance, that some of the rule changes considered by the Commission may impact in some way questions of competitive advantage having antitrust implications. That consideration, along with my belief that a public decisionmaking should be open and fair, leads me to offer this amendment.

This amendment would provide that within 30 days before approving a proposed rule change of economic significance, the Commission would be required to give public notice of the change in the Federal Register and allow a reasonable period of time for public comment. All decisions of the Commission would be required to be reached within 60 days of receipt of the proposed rule change. I do not believe these time limits are onerous.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment does not impose additional unnecessary administrative burdens on the Commission. My amendment seeks only to clarify the authority already permitted in the Commodity Exchange Act. It would insure that the congressional intent of the act is spelled out clearly. My amendment will support the Commission in its oversight function, not detract from it. I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AuCOIN. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Washington, the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, we have examined the public notice amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCoin); and speaking for myself I have no objection to its adoption.

Mr. AuCOIN. I appreciate the comments of the chairman.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AuCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I want to be certain that I understand the extent of what is proposed in the amendment.

Is my understanding correct that all that is required here is that the Commission publish in the Federal Register those new regulations which they have agreed to adopt and enforce? Is that the only requirement which the gentleman is making here?

Mr. AuCOIN. The intent behind the amendment—and I think the language in the amendment makes it clear—is that prior to approval of any rule of major economic significance, that proposed rule would be published in the Federal Register so that adequate public notice would be given; and a 30-day period is allowed so that public comment can be reserved and so that parties affected by such a rule would have an opportunity to bring forward their views, their arguments, or any facts that they may have. This is to assure that no one is caught by surprise or sandbagged or affected by a rule that has been proposed and approved without his knowledge.

Mr. MADIGAN. If the gentleman will yield further, my concern is that within the course of a 12-month period of time, the Commission might consider 300 suggestions for new rules and not, in the end, actually adopt more than 50 of those rules or 75 of them.

I wonder how the gentleman distinguishes between what is suggested to the Commission in the way of new regulations and what the Commission actually and ultimately adopts.

Mr. AuCOIN. This is important to bring out for the record. I think clearly we would expect, in adopting this amendment, that a regulation or a rule that is not being contemplated seriously for approval would not be published in the Federal Register, nor would a rule that is of routine nature.

Obviously, we do not want to clutter the Federal Register unnecessarily. What I do want in the Federal Register are proposed rules that the Commission is seriously considering and which do have major economic significance, which do have a major impact upon parties who are involved. Those parties should have an opportunity to bring forth information that the Commission needs to understand in order to make a wise decision on the final approval or disapproval of such a rule.

Mr. MADIGAN. Then would it be the gentleman's understanding that the total amount of time that would represent a delay in the Commission being able to enact a regulation so that it could be enforced, would be 30 days?

Mr. AuCOIN. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

(At the request of Mr. Madigan and by unanimous consent, Mr. AuCoin was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. AuCOIN. Current law lays out, as the gentleman knows, a requirement that within 30 days the Commission shall take action on such approvals. This amendment would simply say that there shall be, first, a 30-day period in which public comment is invited by the publication of the proposed rule in the Federal Register. So, in that sense there would be an additional 30 days up front.

In addition to that, after the input has come in from the public, the language that now is in the statute that says that the Commission shall, within 30 days, make a decision, still pertains. So, conceivably, it could allow up to 60 days.

However, I would want to make the additional point that this amendment does not touch that portion of section 5a(c) of the act, which allows emergency procedures on the part of the Commission to take immediate action if it finds that there is a practice that is being engaged in in some contract market which results in skullduggery and crookedness. That provision in the law allows very timely, swift and speedy action to overcome such practices. This amendment does not touch that existing provision of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. Glickman and by unanimous consent, Mr. AuCoin was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to finish the point I attempted to make, that I have made a deliberate attempt not to involve every single rule that is proposed—housekeeping changes, routine changes, and the like. This surely is clear from the floor colloquy on the amendment, and from the language of the amendment.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AuCOIN. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. As I understand it, the gentleman is talking about Board of Trade of Exchange Rules, as opposed to new regulations promulgated by the Commission itself, in which case notice already has to be given under the rule and under the Administrative Procedures Act.

Mr. AuCOIN. Correct. This tries to track as closely as possible on the principles embodied in the Administrative Procedures Act.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I support the gentleman. It turns out that in many cases the Board of Trade rules are more significant than those the Commission promulgates. I know of people who practice under the securities laws, and I find that the Securities Exchange Commission requires comparable notice and approval in the New York Stock Exchange, the American Stock Exchange, or other regional stock exchange rules. I am glad the gentleman has indicated that he is talking about significant rules changes as opposed to date changes or something fairly minor.

Mr. AuCOIN. Absolutely. I have no interest in the latter.

What I am interested in is fair play. If one is affected by some proposed rule it is only fair that one ought to know what is being proposed—rather than be left in the dark until after the rule affecting him has gone into effect.

Mr. GLICKMAN. If the gentleman will yield further, we are going to provide that the public ought to have knowledge of all these rules, and maybe the exchanges can offer competitive rules.

Mr. AuCOIN. I agree. I appreciate the gentleman's support.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I would like to ask the gentleman a question or two. Could the gentleman tell us if an administration position has been announced on his amendment? Was the administration asked for comment on the amendment he has proposed?

Mr. AuCOIN. No.

Mr. FINDLEY. How about the Commission itself?

Mr. AuCOIN. I have been in contact with the Commission on a different version of this amendment, which I must say in candor went far beyond the simple requirement of public notice. On that amendment, the Commission felt there was an overloading of the requirements that were unnecessary for the execution of its functions.

I do not know as of this specific moment whether the Commission approves the simple requirement of public notice. I would say this to the gentleman: If it disapproves, then I think the Commission puts itself in a very interesting position. It puts itself into a more privileged position than the House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. FINDLEY. I am not troubled by the public notice provisions of the amendment, and in all candor I do not have the amendment before me. I have a summary of it supplied by the committee staff. There is one part that troubles me, and that is the No. 1 item which says that any proposed rule affecting contract markets—and here I think a word is omitted—must be accompanied by a detailed economic analysis. Is that in the amendment?

Mr. AuCOIN. No. That is a feature of the original amendment I have indicated has been pared.

Mr. FINDLEY. So that is not in the amendment?

Mr. AuCOIN. It is not in the amendment.

Mr. FINDLEY. Because that would be a very troublesome provision of law that could lead to endless litigation and really delay the rulemaking procedure.

So there is no requirement for an economic analysis in the amendment now pending. Is that correct?

Mr. AuCOIN. That is correct. There is a copy of the amendment at the desk. It comes down to simple notice, so that the public will have an opportunity to know what is going to happen and will have an opportunity to bring forward information the Commission should have at hand before making a decision. I do not see how that can be argued against.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon (Mr. AuCOIN).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to this section of the bill? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEARING ON THE RECORD FOR REFUSAL, SUSPENSION, OR REVOCATION OF CONTRACT MARKET DESIGNATION; COMMISSION SUBPENA POWER

SEC. 10. Section 6 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 8) is amended by—

(1) inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the second sentence;

(2) inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the second sentence of subsection (a);

(3) striking out the third sentence of subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new sentences: "For the purpose of securing effective enforcement of the provisions of this Act, and for the purpose of any investigation or proceeding under this Act, any member of the Commission or any Administrative Law Judge or other officer designated by the Commission is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memorandums, or other records which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction in which such investigation or proceeding is carried on, or where such person resides or carries on business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memorandums, and other records. Such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or Administrative Law Judge or other officer designated by the Commisison, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district wherein such person is an inhabitant or conducts business or wherever such person may be found.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 10 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 10? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEARING ON THE RECORD FOR CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS AND IMPOSITION OF CIVIL PENALTY

SEC. 11. Section 6b of the Commodity Exchange Act (17 U.S.C. 13a) is amended by inserting in the first sentence "on the record" after "hearing".

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are any amendments to section 11?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SYMMS

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SYMMS: On page 14, immediately after line 8, insert the following new section 12 and redesignate the remaining sections accordingly:

SEC. 12. Section 6c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13 a–1) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "Upon the institution of any action under this section by the Commission or the Attorney General subsequent to the effective date of these amendments, the court shall have the power to impose all such sanctions and remedies as the Commission could have imposed pursuant to its authority under the provisions of this chapter including, but not limited to, sections 6, 6(a), 6(b), and 6(c) (7 U.S.C. §§ 8, 9, 13a, and 13b); and, (during the pendency of that action) or subsequent to a final determination on the merits, the Commission shall have no further jurisdiction to initiate administrative proceedings pursuant to its authority under the provisions of this chapter including, but not limited to, sections 6, 6(a), 6(b), and 6(c) (7 U.S.C. §§ 8, 9, 13a, and 13b), regarding the acts or practices complained of in such judicial proceeding unless the court in its discretion remands the matter to the Commission".

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a double jeopardy amendment. I think that many members of the committee are well aware of the much celebrated soybean case, or whatever you wish to call it, last year, that took place when the Commodity Futures Commission made accusations against the Hunt family that they were speculating in too large holdings in the soybean market, in other words held more contracts than the rules allowed.

The concern I have had over this is that the farmers of the United States were the ones who were the losers, when the Commission went public the soybean market broke and exports were also hurt because of uncertainty from overseas.

I do not think we need to go into whether or not it was effective for the Commission to make a public exposure of the Hunt family or not. In my opinion CFTC was dead wrong. What happened was that the CFTC filed action against the Hunt family. They had a press conference, after which the soybean market went down immediately because of all the ballyhoo in the press and the soybean prices went down so that the farmers were hurt.

But I think since then what happened is the critical point.

The court was called in, the CFTC requested them to hold a court case on it. The court case was held. There was an appeal that is taking place. And, since the CFTC did not get their way, in other words they lost their case, and there were no charges brought against the people who were accused of wrongdoing, in other words they—the Hunts—were acquitted, then the CFTC filed an administrative action.

I think that this is something we do not want any regulatory agency to be doing in this Government of ours. If a person goes to court and that person is acquitted, that should end the case, they should not have to stand trial again on the same set of facts.

What happened here is that we had the defendants taken to court and they were acquitted. There is an appeal in process, but that is being handled by the courts, and then there is an administrative charge being processed now, side by side with the court action.

So, in other words, as I say, this is double jeopardy.

I would like to tick off some of the points that I think make this amendment important and why it should be adopted, because this should not take place in every agency of the Government. However, we are not dealing with every agency of the Government, we are dealing with the Commodity Futures Commission. The CFTC brought the case, and it is an attempt to put speculative limits placed on individual speculators who are financially solvent, realizing that this was what the case was all about, how many contracts on soybeans are permitted or limited to any person in order to trade in.

Now they are talking about removing those administrative requirements they had in the past, and this case is still going to the courts and the taxpayers are literally paying hundreds of thousands of dollars a month to be trying cases like this through administrative review.

Some of the points we are trying to make are as follows:

The CFTC has powers not available to comparable agencies, if we allow them to do this.

In this case there would have been no violation if members of one family had not been singled out. No individual was ever in violation.

The CFTC did not charge any manipulation of the market occurred or was attempted by any or all of the parties here charged.

It has never been the intention of the Congress to give any agency of the Government powers not granted under the Constitution.

The amendment only requires the CFTC to adhere to findings of the court when it goes to court.

This amendment does not deprive the CFTC the right of going to court when it does not achieve its desires in administrative actions.

To summarize my remarks I would make the following 14 points.

POINTS THAT NEED TO BE MADE IN DEBATE

First CFTC is placing Hunt in double jeopardy, if not by letter of the law then certainly the spirit of the law.

Second. If not double jeopardy, then harassment of persons over minor regulations they (CFTC) are proposing to abandon.

Third. By assessment of the chairman of the Commission in an administrative proceeding the Commission is the cop on the beat, prosecuting attorney, jury, and judge.

Fourth. CFTC now has powers not available to comparable agencies.

Fifth. This amendment is not just against CFTC, but the first step against an overwhelming growing power of bureaucracy to invade the powers of the judiciary reserved under the separation of powers concept in the Constitution.

Sixth. In this case, there would have been no violation if members of one family had not been singled out for special treatment or the issue of aggregation of holdings. No individual was ever in violation.

Seventh. The CFTC did not charge that any manipulation of the market occurred or was attempted by any or all of the parties charged.

Eighth. It has never been the intention of the Congress to give any agency power not granted under the Constitution.

Ninth. The amendment only requires the CFTC to adhere to findings of the court when the CFTC elects to go to the courts on any matter.

Tenth. This amendment does not deprive the CFTC the right of going to court when it fails to achieve its desire in administrative action.

Eleventh. Prevents appropriated funds from being used in simultaneous actions on the same issue.

Twelfth. The amendment does not require the CFTC to go to court on any matter.

Thirteenth. Most other agencies are required to go to court on certain issues.

Fourteenth. There is a growing concern in the country over the excessive powers of bureaucracy. If this kind of "double jeopardy" is tolerated for the purposes of CFTC, then where do we draw the line? Once the precedent is set and goes unchallenged then it will be possible for other Government agencies to use similar tactics.

It will prevent appropriated funds from being used in simultaneous actions on the same issue. That is the key to the whole thing. Do we want to have a double case going on where we have an administrative judicial process taking place and the courts taking care of them? The amendment does not require CFTC to go to court on any matter, and most agencies are required to go to court on certain issues. I think the growing concern is the excessive powers of bureaucracy of this country. I think it is essential that we tie down regulatory agencies with constitutional law in principle. The separation of powers doctrine certainly is at stake here. Any American citizen, whether rich or poor, should, I think, have equality under the law. If they are acquitted in the court case, or if the court would acquit them in this case and there is an appeal being filed it should be handled by the judical system and not interfered with by the regulatory agency.

I think if there are any questions, I would be happy to try to answer them. It is a rather complex matter, but I do hope that the committee would accept this amendment and tie down this regulatory agency so that in the future we will not run the risk of having a political witch hunt or something else take place where it costs the farmers of this country.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. HARKIN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SYMMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SYMMS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HARKIN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We have got a lot of amendments here on the floor, and I have been trying to find the gentleman's amendment and read it.

Mr. SYMMS. It is at the desk. This is the same amendment that was offered by the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) in the committee.

Mr. HARKIN. Is this what is otherwise known as the "bail-out-of-Hunt" amendment?

Mr. SYMMS. No, it is not the bailout. This would have no effect on the Hunt case. What has happened has already happened. I know the gentleman would like to use that as an excuse. It would have no effect on anything that has happened in the past. Only in the future would it say we cannot have double jeopardy. It is a bail-out-the-taxpayers amendment because the gentleman and I as taxpayers are probably paying lawyers now in excess of $100,000 a month to go out and try to prosecute certain individuals for something that the Commission itself is already changing the regulations on, that limitations on numbers of contracts that any person can trade are no longer to be limited by CFTC. So what we are seeing here is a case of proposition 13 in reverse. In other words, let us go out and spend the taxpayers' money, raise havoc. We take them to court. They are acquitted in court, so we will go out and get them in a double jeopardy case by using administrative review.

Mr. HARKIN. Thank you for the clarification, this is not the "bail-out-of-Hunt" amendment; it is the "bail-out-of-the-Hunts-in-the-future" amendment.

Mr. SYMMS. No. The gentleman can throw the word around if he wants to, but I think he is missing the point. I think the gentleman will agree that in the courts if one is acquitted, one is innocent; is that correct? Would the gentleman agree if one is acquitted in court, he is innocent? So what happened here is there was a court case; it was adjudicated in the court; and there is an appeal taking place presently. But then when the Futures Commission did not get the result they wanted in court, they started an administrative battle process, going back over administrative argument, and it is all water under the bridge. But the people who suffered are the farmers of the United States who grow soybeans in Iowa and Illinois and places like that, because the exposure of this whole thing to the press presented a picture to people in foreign countries who read our newspapers that something was going on here that really might be wrong or innocent.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SYMMS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SYMMS. I think that what we need to do in the Congress is to try to limit the scope of the regulatory agency, the CFTC, properly so we would be the referee to see that everyone is treated equitably on the floor of the Board of Trade, the New York Mercantile Exchange, the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, and other Futures Commissions. That is what I would like to achieve so that people can be treated equitably. What happened was that I think a misjudgment on the part of the Commission to interfere in something where they made a big deal in the press cost the American people exports of soybeans because something appeared to be happening that was wrong, and it was adjudicated in the courts and proven there was no wrongdoing, and no manipulation of the market. The only thing that happened is our farmers—yours and mine—suffered because exports went down. I would like to avoid that in the future.

What happens in the case now? I think the Hunt family will survive. They, at great expense, are fighting and winning their case. The farmers are the ones who were hurt. I think we can limit this now. We can say a mistake was made, but we can correct a future mistake in the Commodity Futures Commission by saying no more double jeopardy.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise to speak against the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have some sympathy with the amendment being offered, but it relates to a fundamental problem in the administrative process, whereby what is the function of the courts and what is the function of an administrative agency in dealing with, let us say, fraudulent conduct?

The way the Administrative Procedures Act is administered and the way it is implemented by most Federal agencies, the courts have the power to provide equitable relief, let us say, in an injunctive action preventing future behavior or a temporary restraining order, or in some cases an order compelling restitution; whereas the administrative agency is generally the body of government that has the expertise to decide basically the nitty-gritty of the fraudulent conduct or the alleged fraudulent conduct that occurred and to decide whether the person or persons alleged to have committed that conduct should be or should not be removed from office, or should be debarred or not debarred from office. Generally the courts do not have that expertise whatsoever. Therefore, I believe that this amendment, if adopted, would deprive a proper execution of the laws of the Commodity Exchange Act, inasmuch as it would deprive the agency from going further and deciding all the aspects of a case, relying on a Federal judge, and also this would treat this agency entirely different from every other Federal agency that is permitted to go into court to stop alleged fraudulent practices, which the agency cannot do administratively, and then to proceed administratively on a separate issue.

I will admit to the gentleman that in some cases there has been some abuse. clearly, and there needs to be some administrative law reform to prevent that abuse; but this amendment would unfairly single out this agency and all the other agencies would not have this type of restrictive provision and it is something that is not wise in protecting the customers of this country in the purchase of commodities.

So, while I have some sympathy with the problems involved, I urge rejection of the amendment.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, is the gentleman suggesting that we knock out all laws that provide for the criminal prosecution of fraud and that we abolish all fraud prosecutions?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No.

Mr. KELLY. Because the courts, obviously, cannot handle it, based on what the gentleman just said. They just are not equipped. They do not have the expertise. They do not have the machinery; so the idea of prosecuting people in these courts that lack the ability to handle the cases probably does not sound very just and we should abolish all fraud prosecutions.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would disagree with the gentleman. The concept is one of function.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, that is not my suggestion. It is the suggestion of the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

Mr. GLICKMAN. No.

Mr. KELLY. So the gentleman is disagreeing with himself?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No; what I said, they are separate functions of the administrative process and the Federal judiciary and not functions of the administrative process, which administrative process can fully on a long and detailed case analysis determine whether the laws of the country have been violated and determine whether brokers should be suspended, barred, fines paid, and that sort of thing. That is clearly not a function of the courts. The gentleman is talking about something else. The courts clearly have jurisdiction under existing law to prosecute criminal cases.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, would the gentleman agree that the regulating agency has the power to impose a penalty just by the ability to bring an individual into court, because this immediately imposes tremendous delays and tremendous expense and if an individual does not have the money to combat the agency in court, then great injustice can be accomplished.

Mr. GLICKMAN. There is no question these agenies can wreak havoc; but when I am talking about administrative reforms, it is across the board and restriction of the power initially in the administrative agencies with respect to bringing the cases.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, that is exactly what the Symms amendment is trying to do, is to avoid a double jeopardy proposition.

If the matter is taken to court, then they will handle the matter in court, and I think the fact that the courts do handle so many fraud cases of great complexity indicates clearly that they have the ability to do so.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the discussion between the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) and the gentleman from Florida (Mr. KELLY) has elucidated most of the issues here, but I think it would be extremely unwise for this Committee to accept the Symms amendment.

There are circumstances where an emergency requires the Commission to go to court for injunctive relief. These circumstances only occur in situations which the Commission regards as most urgent.

Under the Symms amendment, once the court's jurisdiction had been invoked, even by an application for injunction, all further administrative actions by the Commission would be suspended until the resolution of that particular court determination. This might take weeks or months.

We have had situations, of course, as the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) suggested, where some regulatory agencies have in the opinion of many overreached or abused their authority, but there have also been very prominent cases in recent years and months where this particular Commission has been helpless to block significant cases of fraud because of legal delays and other difficulties which the Commission faced. As a result, one celebrated swindler was permitted to bilk citizens of tens of millions of dollars and, indeed, that led to a whole new question about whether options would be permitted at all in the future as an instrument of trade.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I will yield to the gentleman in just one moment.

It seems to me extraordinary, with all the complaints that have been raised against this Commission regarding its failure to take more effective action on the so-called options scandals, that we would now find Members of the House saying to the Commission, "After we have given you authority to go to court for an injunction, the moment you do that, you can do nothing else."

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that would invite some extraordinary abuses.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the committee chairman if it is not so that under the present law an individual could be taken into court for injunctive relief, and that that procedure would be subject to a series of appeals, and then that individual could be taken into an administrative procedure, the results of which then could be subject to a series of appeals? And is it not true that that same individual taxpayer, who is trying to make our economy go, could be subject to two appeals at the same time, possibly one that he had instituted and one that the Commission had instituted, plus having to go into the administrative hearing plus the court hearing, and that much of what would go on in the appellate courts, in the trial court, and in the administrative proceedings would be all on the same facts, and there would be tremendous overlapping?

So would not the Symms amendment just simply say that the administrative agency would have an opportunity to make its choice? Once having made its choice, then the Government could not beat a taxpayer to death with oppressive repetitions of court proceedings and expenses.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman suggests that this amendment is only going to operate to prevent honest taxpaying citizens from being abused by the overreach of regulatory authority.

But let us take an example of the type of case that this language involves; for example, the infamous Carr case. This is the case of a person who is reported to have carried on bucket shop operations in options around the country fraudulently taking millions of dollars away from individual citizens. In a case like this, it would be extraordinary if the gentleman is suggesting that Mr. Carr should not be subjected to regulatory restraint merely because the Commission had applied to court for an injunction.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I will yield in just a moment to the gentleman.

First, Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear to the other Members here that this action would prevent the Commission from doing what it should be doing—coming down very heavily and very dramatically where there is strong evidence the public interest is being abused, as it has occurred in this case.

The fact of the matter is that the Commission had great criticism that it did not stop this man in his tracks, who with enormous arrogance, continued carrying on this activity while court cases were pending.

I do not want to see the taxpayers subjected to unfair tactics. But, on the other hand, I do not want to tie this Commission's hands behind its back when it is dealing with a flagrant violator of the law. What the gentleman's amendment would do, unfortunately, would be to largely dissipate the Commission's authority to deal with that type of offender once they had gone into court and asked for a preliminary injunction.

Mr. KELLY. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KELLY. I think that the chairman misunderstands the Symms amendment. The Symms amendment does not in any way preclude giving the ax to a crook. But what the Symms amendment does is provide that you give them the ax after they have been found to be guilty, and not before.

This is actually what the Symms amendment is trying to accomplish.

Mr. FOLEY. I understand that we are talking about civil remedies and criminal remedies and, so far as the gentleman is concerned, I agree with him that criminal penalties should never be imposed until the person is found to be criminally liable. But if there is evidence that administrative procedures can prevent abuses which exist in the trading of securities or the trading of commodities or instruments of trade under the jurisdiction of this Commission, it seems to me extraordinary that we would not want the Commission to carry out those administrative responsibilities. And to bar them from doing so simply because they have asked for an injunction would be most unfortunate.

Mr. KELLY. If the gentleman will yield further, I would like to point out this one additional proposition: The Symms amendment is not going to in any way prevent them from stopping the crook that the gentleman described. They have to go into court anyway. So that provision is still protected under the Symms amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. SYMMS and by unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Idaho.

Mr. SYMMS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons that brought on my interest to this issue is the fact that I thought the Commission should have been working on the Carr case. Instead they are going into the established, well operated exchanges, such as the Chicago and New York Mercantile Exchanges and the Chicago Board of Trade, where they have these problems under control. It was my understanding and in my opinion it appeared that the Commissioners were interested in headlines when they should have been after the people involved in a swindle; and there was not too much done about the Carr case, if anything.

I think this amendment would just simply say that the Commission from now on will have to generate its efforts after the bona fide criminals, they will not have the ability to just take after one person, just go after them in some sort of witch hunt, so to speak.

Mr. FOLEY. I do not think that is what the amendment says at all. The amendment says that, once the Commission goes to court——

Mr. SYMMS. It goes to court and the person is acquitted.

Mr. FOLEY (continuing). To seek any court action, their administrative authority is suspended.

Mr. SYMMS. On the same set of facts.

Mr. FOLEY. On the same set of facts.

I think that poses a violation of the Commission's rules and regulations which will create serious dangers of risk or other loss by the public if they apply for a court injunction to stop them.

Mr. SYMMS. The chairman himself just mentioned the Carr case, where the person was an outright crook. If they had taken that to court I do not think there would be a problem. There would not need to be administrative review. But when they take them to court and the person is acquitted, why should they go back and go over the same ground?

Mr. FOLEY. I think the taxpayers have lost more, those unfortunate taxpayers who apparently were the victims of this individual, Mr. Carr, than it probably cost the Commission for much of its activity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. KELLY and by unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. If we want to be concerned about the taxpayers, we ought to be concerned with whether the Commission is able to effectively carry out the duties that have been imposed upon it by the Congress.

To create an agency and give it a mandate to enforce proper dealing in commodities futures and then turn around and deny them effective enforcement is a real waste of the taxpayers' money.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. KELLY. I thank the chairman for yielding.

My question is this: My understanding of the Symms amendment is that it provides that once the agency goes into court, the agency is not precluded in any way from having whatever regulatory impact that it would otherwise have. The only difference is that they will then have to stay with the court as a fact-finding body rather than permitting the agency itself to then take over this function. The reason for that is to prevent the duplication in the presentation of evidence to accomplish an economy and to remove the agency itself from the factfinding responsibility when it has interposed itself in the case as an advocate. Under the committee bill, 1 minute you are in the position of arguing with the agency in court as an opponent, and the next moment you are before the agency, and they are the judge. This would be logically an uncomfortable situation.

That is what I understand the Symms amendment is providing a remedy for. It does not in any way limit the agency power. It does not in any way limit the law. It just simply prevents duplication of effort.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I can regain the time the gentleman so generously provided me, I would say again that we have attempted to give some very extensive responsibilities to this Commission to control and regulate activities in an ever-growing area of commerce where a trillion dollars worth of contracts were traded last year.

It seems to me that we have the duty of assuring the protection of those hundreds of thousands of people who are dealing in futures contracts and in options.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment goes too far, in my judgment, in limiting the authority of the Commission. The losers will be the taxpayers, who will have an ineffective enforcement procedure, and who may be subject to serious losses.

Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. SYMMS).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SYMMS) there were—ayes 6, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to section 11?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

JURISDICTION OF THE STATES

SEC. 12. The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding after section 6c a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6d. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, in order to promote effective enforcement, curtail or prevent fraud, protect the public interest, and effectively utilize the resources available to State agencies, any State agency or official may—

"(1) investigate or prosecute in a civil action violations of this Act (except violations set forth in subsection (2) hereof), of section 217 of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, or of the rules or regulations thereunder in any district court of the United States which would have jurisdiction thereof, if such action had been brought by the Commission, and that court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any such action brought under this section, and the Commission shall be entitled as of right to intervene in any such action as a party thereto: Provided, however, That a State agency or official may not investigate or prosecute any violation of the Acts or the rules and regulations thereunder committed or alleged to be committed by a designated contract market or a board of trade licensed by the Commission (or committed or alleged to be committed by the organization clearing transactions thereon);

"(2) investigate and prosecute in a civil action, whenever authorized as parens patriae, any such violation committed or alleged to be committed by any person with respect to any account, agreement, or transaction (including the solicitation thereof) involving contracts of sale of a commodity for future delivery traded or executed on such designated contract market or licensed board of trade; and

"(3) investigate and prosecute violations of the criminal statutes of such State.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 12 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PERFECTING AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FOLEY

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Perfecting amendment offered by Mr. FOLEY: On page 14, lines 18 and 19, strike out "(except violations set forth in subsection (2) hereof)";

On page 15, line 8, insert "and" at the end thereof;

On page 15, strike out lines 9 through 16; and

On page 15, line 17, strike out "(3)" and insert in lieu thereof "(2)".

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, my amendment simplifies the procedure whereby a State may enforce the provisions of the Commodity Exchange Act.

The committee bill authorizes the States to prosecute in Federal courts violations of the act relating to options contracts and leverage contracts. States can also take action against violations of the act involving futures contracts, except for violations by boards of trade, if they first establish in Federal court that they are authorized to do so under parens patriae.

Mr. Chairman, there is some confusion in court decisions about the meaning of parens patriae. Generally it means a State must show the violation causing harm to the general welfare of its citizens. There is sufficient lack of clarity in this standing concept to create the possibility of some extended litigation in the event a State did go into Federal court; under the bill as reported a State can only enforce the Federal statute by first establishing that it was acting under parens patriae.

To make abundantly clear that the States can bring their resources to bear to prevent violations or continued violations on the part of any person subject to the act, my amendment would delete the necessity of demonstrating that the State is acting under the parens patriae doctrine. Under this amendment, it would be sufficient for the State to demonstrate that a violation occurred, and that the Commission would have authority to come in and to take civil action in the same jurisdiction under the same circumstances.

At the same time, I hope that the adoption of this amendment would lead the committee to reject an amendment which I know my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS) is about to offer. The Baldus amendment seeks to strike this entire section, and say that if the States adopt statutory language identical to that contained in the Commodity Exchange Act, they could then enter State courts and enforce their State statutes. It seems to me that this approach creates two serious problems.

One is that it risks the possibility of varying decisions in the States and Federal courts. The Baldus amendment will of course, as the gentleman will tell the committee shortly, say that Federal court decisions shall control, that regulations and decisions of the Commission shall be binding, and that the State courts must recognize them. But, even though the language of the State and Federal statutes may be identical the possibility of different results when different agencies enforce different statutes, one in Federal court and the other in a State court, troubles me. Second, the Baldus amendment has a heavy precondition, that the States adopt the Federal language exactly. I think only a few States are likely to do that. My amendment on the other hand would facilitate a very broad reach of State participation in all States by eliminating the parens patriae requirement and removing the requirement that the States first adopt statutory provisions identical to those contained in the Commodity Exchange Act.

I think both Mr. BALDUS and I agree, and the committee bill expresses the sense of the committee, that we want some additional enforcement in addition to that which the Commission is able to generate; but I think it is preferable to have that State enforcement through the Federal courts rather than through the courts of the several States, the District of Columbia, et cetera.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make sure that I understand exactly what the chairman is offering. If I understand the amendment correctly, it clarifies the circumstances under which a State can bring an action. It stipulates that action would have to be brought in a Federal court, and as a consequence of doing that, the Commission would have a right to intervene in the action. Is my understanding essentially correct?

Mr. FOLEY. Yes, the gentleman is correct. What the committee bill authorizes the States to do is to prosecute in Federal court violations relating to options contracts and leverage contracts. They are not authorized to take action against violations involving boards of trade, but other futures contracts violations they could take into Federal court. However, since under the bill reported by the Agriculture Committee, since the State must first establish that it is acting under parens patriae, which is a confusing doctrine, the resolution of that issue could give rise to a great deal of litigation. My amendment would remove that preliminary requirement and the attendant litigation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the chairman for offering this amendment. As he knows, the subcommittee and the full committee worked quite a while with this particular problem, and finally agreed on the language offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ENGLISH) as a substitute for the provision that had previously been offered by Mr. BALDUS of Wisconsin.

I think that the area of clarification required as a result of the adoption of the English amendment is addressed well by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) and that it now provides what I judge to be the best possible product, and therefore I urge the committee to adopt the amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I am not rising in opposition to the amendment, Mr. Chairman. Rather I think it goes in the right direction but it is an inch in the right direction and not a giant step at all.

The problem still lies in what the States' attorneys general say is the problem of the States through their mechanism of getting into Federal court. Although we may have eased that somewhat, it certainly does not resolve the problems the State securities commissioners and the State legislators and the attorneys general say is their problem.

I know as a State legislator that we frequently adopted securities laws—not futures trading, but security laws—that were identical to Federal laws. There was the way we did it—except as they take exception. They do occasionally take exception

I understand that the futures traders do not want to have that problem of exceptions, and we have dealt with that in my amendment by saying the State can only adopt identical—that is an inelastic term, identical is identical—and the laws pursuant to that must be identical and the decisions by the court must conform to the regulations of the CFTC.

So although I do not oppose the amendment I do want to say it is not a substitute for the amendment I offer.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Foley amendment. The chairman has well explained the amendment and its purpose. Although I am not sure he goes far enough, it is what we need at this point.

I was not in support of the provision in the committee bill and consider this amendment to be a much needed improvement.

The committee bill would not provide effective State enforcement assistance to the CFTC. Under the committee bill a State could only investigate or prosecute civil violations involving futures transactions only under an ambiguous legal doctrine. If we are going to ask for State enforcement assistance, it should apply across the board to exchange traded futures contracts as well as off-exchange traded leverage and options contracts.

The Foley amendment corrects this shortcoming in the committee bill and I plan to support it.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the upcoming Baldus amendment.

Mr. Chairman, today the House will consider H.R. 10285, a bill to reauthorize appropriations for the Commodity Futures Trading Commission (CFTC) for a period of 3 years, which contains a number of other substantive amendments to the Commodity Exchange Act.

Mr. BALDUS, my colleague from Wisconsin, has printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for June 7, 1978, an amendment which he plans to offer to section 12 of this bill. The Baldus amendment would provide that "any State agency or official may investigate and prosecute violations of State laws which are identical to sections 4b, 4c, 4d, and 40 of this act (Commodity Exchange Act) and section 217 of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974" subject to certain conditions, such as that State courts must follow the precedents and interpretations of the CFTC and the Federal courts.

While it is argued that States should be given broad enforcement authority in the trading of commodity futures, et cetera, this is not an amendment which would be characterized as fostering States' rights. For State legislators to be forced to rubberstamp Federal legislation and enact identical laws is hardly my idea of the exercise of States' rights. Moreover, a requirement that State courts follow the precedents and interpretations of a Federal agency and Federal courts can hardly be held to give much in the way of "rights" to a State.

It is also worth noting that the strongest support for the Baldus amendment appears to come from State securities commissioners and often the attorney general or Governor of the same State may be found to oppose the amendment.

The provision in the committee bill was thoroughly debated and adopted in the full committee markup after the Baldus amendment had been adopted in the subcommittee.

I urge you to oppose the Baldus amendment as an amendment which has the potential, if not the reality, of causing regulatory chaos with 50 States and the CFTC attempting to enforce 51 identical—if such is possible—laws.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the perfecting amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

The perfecting amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BALDUS

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BALDUS: Strike out all of section 12 beginning on page 14, line 10 through and including page 15, line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 12. The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding after section 6c a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6d. (1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in order to promote effective enforcement, curtail and prevent fraud, protect the public interest, and effectively utilize the resources available to State agencies, any State agency or official may investigate and prosecute violations of State laws which are identical to sections 4b, 4c, 4d, and 4o of this Act and section 217 of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974 or the rules and regulations of the Commission under those sections: Provided, That any civil and criminal penalties provided for under such State laws do not exceed the civil and criminal penalties provided for violation of the identical sections of this Act and of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974 Any such State law shall include the following language: 'In any such action, Federal law, including the decisions of the Federal courts and the decisions and published interpretations of the Commission, shall be controlling.' Notwithstanding the foregoing, a State agency or official may not investigate or prosecute any violation committed or alleged to be committed by a designated contract market or a board of trade licensed by the Commission or any violation committed or alleged to be committed by any persons if said violation occurs solely on such designated contract market or licensed board of trade. Any agency bringing an action under authority of this section shall give notice of the action to the Commission by mailing a copy of the original pleadings or of the original indictment to the Commission no later than three business days after the action is filed, and the Commission may intervene of right in any such action at any time.

"(2) Nothing contained in this Act shall affect the authority of any State to seek alternative enforcement remedies which are consistent with the Commission's jurisdiction granted under this Act, including actions as described in subsection (1) of this section, actions under a State's general criminal or civil antifraud statutes, its general consumer protection laws, or other similar laws of general applicability."

Mr. BALDUS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the amendment be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS)?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, when in 1974 the Congress passed into law the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act which created the CFTC and gave it exclusive jurisdiction over the enforcement of the antifraud provisions of the commodity trading laws, thus preempting the States from any enforcement role. This was done in spite of the fact that the States have demonstrated their enforcement and regulatory capabilities in the area of securities law, over which they share jurisdiction with the Federal Government, and insurance laws, over which they have exclusive jurisdiction.

The problem has been that, regardless of one's opinion as to the effectiveness of the CFTC, the resources and manpower required to monitor the industry on a nationwide basis have never been provided to the CFTC, nor is it likely that they ever will be provided. The CFTC's enforcement staff numbers only around 120 people, and that includes clerical personnel. Because of this manpower shortage, no one has been effectively monitoring the industry and no one has any real idea of the extent of fraud which may be occurring. I do know that the North American Securities Administrator's Association (representing all of the administrators, not just a few) and the National Conference of State Legislators feel strongly enough about the need for expanded enforcement that they have actively sought State enforcement and have specifically endorsed my amendment, as has the National Farmers Union and the NFO.

My amendment would fill the current enforcement void by allowing the States to pass and enforce identical State laws. In recognition of the concern of the futures trading industry that State enforcement might subject the industry to contending with 50 different bodies of law, the amendment would only allow the States to pass laws which are identical to five sections of Federal law. Not "similar to," Mr. Chairman, but "identical to."

Because of the possibility that in applying the identical law to specific actions there may be a difference of interpretation. My amendment further requires the State laws to include the following: Please listen.

In any such action, Federal law, including the decisions of the Federal courts and the decisions and published interpretations of the Commission, shall be controlling.

In those rare cases where the State may make an interpretation with which the CFTC does not concur, the CFTC need only publish an interpretation which will be controlling on the decision of the court.

In addition, the CFTC must be promptly notified within 30 days of any State action and is expressly granted the right to intervene in any such action at its own discretion.

I would like to point out that the majority of activity conducted by legitimate trading companies is exempted from State prosecution. The amendment states:

Notwithstanding the foregoing, a State agency or official may not investigate or prosecute any violation committed or alleged to be committed by a designated contract market or a board of trade licensed by the Commission or any violation committed or alleged to be committed by any persons if said violation occurs solely on such designated contract market or licensed board of trade.

The States may not prosecute violations of futures trading companies or their employees which are committed on the boards of trade or in designated contract markets.

It may be oversimplifying to say that is everybody but the crooks.

Mr. Chairman, my amendment was originally passed by the Conservation and Credit Subcommittee after holding extensive hearings on the CFTC. The Commissioners of the CFTC voted to accept my amendment at that time. The amendment was then taken out of the bill in the full committee by the narrow margin of 20 to 18 at a time when debate was extremely limited so that the bill could be reported in time to meet the April 15 deadline.

Mr. Chairman, the five sections of Federal law which I would allow the States to pass do not empower the States to subject the industry to additional regulations. If we can subject securities companies to the concurrent jurisdiction of State governments, I can see no reason why we should exempt the futures trading industry from State review identical to that of the CFTC.

Mr. Chairman, the Congress has already passed a law prohibiting fraudulent activity. The question before us is whether we are going to have State enforcement. I urge my colleagues to vote for expanded enforcement by voting for my amendment.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS) but I think the thing we need to do is not to deal with the legal reasons for it, but rather the practical reasons why this was precipitated.

In the first place, vast amounts of capital which used to flow into the securities markets are now flowing into the futures markets, and while nobody, not the GAO, the CFTC, the Securities and Exchange Commission, nor the Treasury knows how much, we do know that it is gigantic.

One of the reasons for this is because there is more speculative activity in the futures market than in the securities markets, and that is where the gambling is and that it where the action is. As a result, the futures business have been spreading all over the country, and in many cases a majority of the business formerly of a securities nature is now in the futures markets because there is more chance of making a quick buck, not just futures in farm commodities, but futures in Treasury bills, FNMA, GNMA, mortgages, even futures on indexes and aggregates, like a proposed future on the Dow-Jones industrial average. Along with this goes the natural phenomena of fleecing of customers in the form of boilerplate operations. Most firms are honest, and most firms do not engage in this kind of conduct.

But historically where that activity occurred in some places in the securities business, it has moved over in the futures business. If we wait historically until the CFTC has taken action with their limited manpower to prevent the fleecing, the wool will already have been pulled over everybody's eyes in the State. So, therefore, what this amendment does is to provide States with the opportunity to enforce fraudulent violations of futures laws in the same manner that they have been able to enforce fraudulent violations of securities laws, which has worked very well over the last 40 years, which has provided an additional arm to prevent our constituents from being bilked by those few but very, very tenacious fraudulent operators.

In the Lloyd Carr case we heard testimony in committee where the Michigan Securities Commissioner became aware of that case. It transferred that to the CFTC. The State could not take any action on their own because they were precluded from doing so under State law, and the CFTC did not act because they did not have the necessary manpower and perhaps did not have the inclination. I submit that this is one way in our Federal system where we can bifurcate that manpower by permitting those local officials who can stop the fraud faster in your town or my town, U.S.A., to get a handle on it, and get those State officials to go into State court to enjoin that activity, or to prevent its commission until such time as the CFTC can get involved.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLEMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Did the gentleman mean to say that they could not enforce it because they did not have a State law? Is that what the gentleman said?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I said historically they could not enforce commodities futures violations because they were precluded under Federal law.

Mr. COLEMAN. The gentleman said "State law."

Mr. GLICKMAN. I am sorry; no, Federal law.

What has happened in the securities business is that these fraudulent activities develop on a localized basis, and the people who are going to find out about them first are the local law enforcement authorities. Are they going to contact the CFTC? The answer probably is no. What has happened is they have contacted the State securities commissioner or State attorney general who has brought some action to prevent it from recurring until the CFTC is involved. That is the same kind of thing we propose in the Baldus amendment to provide the flexibility to get the fraud stopped first on a State basis, and then to permit the CFTC to decide if they think the case is big enough to prosecute it, or that it has national implications.

The amendment that my chairman has offered eases that procedure some, because it provides that the States' securities commissioners or the States' attorneys general can enforce actions in Federal court without relying on a complicated legal doctrine called parens patriae, but it still does not deal with the problem that in many States' attorneys general and securities commissioners by law cannot go into Federal court. As I understand it on information supplied by the National Association of States' Attorneys General, 33 States in this country are either partially or fully restricted from ever going into Federal court on these types of matters. So what we are really dealing with here is, what is the most practical way of enforcing fraud cases? What is the most realistic way of enforcing a case where your constituents are being bilked in Hutchinson, Kans., Peoria, Ill., or Dallas, Tex.?

Is it waiting until an understaffed and in many cases questionably competent CFTC comes in and investigates the case after $50 million are stolen from the people? Or is it letting that fraudulent conduct be stopped first at the State level and then giving the Federal level, the CFTC, the power to decide if it wants to proceed on a big case?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GLICKMAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Let me tell you one final thing that has happened in the securities area. In most Federal fraud securities cases, the States go ahead and retain jurisdiction if the case does not involve gigantic jurisdictional problems or gigantic implications. If it is a small fraud, they give it to the States. If it is a big fraud, they give it to the SEC.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the Baldus amendment.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COLEMAN. Mr. Chairman, getting back to my question, because of State law they were precluded. The gentleman did say "State" and then the gentleman said he meant to say "Federal," but then the gentleman said State, because under the amendment 33 States are precluded from going into Federal, because of State laws; is that not correct?

Mr. GLICKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. COLEMAN. We are talking about State policy, because there are 33 States that have a policy not to do that which the gentleman is trying to force down their throats; is that not correct?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No, no. They cannot go into court. It does not replace the CFTC in the case.

Mr. COLEMAN. It is either a hesitancy on their part from the enforcement standpoint, or the law on the State books which precludes them, or something else.

Mr. GLICKMAN. It is something else.

Mr. COLEMAN. Let us find out what the something else is, because we are trying to force something else on 33 States.

Mr. GLICKMAN. No. Under the Baldus amendment, we are trying to get States to do what many or most of them have done under the security laws.

Mr. COLEMAN. The gentleman is saying they have done it with security laws, but they have not done it in this area of concern. Is it as a hesitancy on their part, is there a Federal rule or something else; let us find out what it is.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GLICKMAN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, the reason they have not done it, the Federal commodities laws have precluded them from doing it and we prevented the States from enacting State commodities statutes. We preempted them. We did not do it in the securities laws, because the history of the development of the law did not deem that advisable.

Mr. COLEMAN. If Federal preemption is the issue, we ought to discuss the issue of Federal preemption, not why 33 States are ready to go on this and feel they cannot. I suggest if the Baldus amendment passes, we will see chaos develop in the court system and it will continue, because we are really cloning State courts, making them little Federal junior courts, giving them Federal laws to pass in the State legislatures, giving them Federal law to follow. Even the State legislatures must pass a law which is identical to Federal law. We are cloning the State courts and making them junior Federal courts and making the legislatures little junior Federal legislatures.

Mr. GLICKMAN. That is a nice red herring to throw out. We have State securities laws and they have worked well. The gentleman is familiar with the securities laws.

Mr. COLEMAN. You used to work with the SEC. The State laws are not identical to the Federal laws.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Some are, some are not.

Mr. COLEMAN. They differ considerably. Let us take the State of Delaware, for example, which has historically been a place where a lot of people like to incorporate, because of different securities laws; is that not correct?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No, that is not correct, because the State corporation laws are much different in Delaware; but generally the State security laws, particularly the fraud laws, parallel the Security Exchange Act of 1934. They have to follow that law.

Mr. COLEMAN. But they do not have to follow Federal law. They do not follow Federal case law.

Mr. GLICKMAN. That is correct.

Mr. COLEMAN. I understand we have a two-tiered judicial system in this country, one with Federal jurisdiction and one with State jurisdiction.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) his expired.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I urge approval of the Baldus amendment.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise to speak in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take the full 5 minutes with regard to this issue. I think it is one that is very simple and one that most of the members of the Committee understand.

The difficulty that we are facing with regard to the Baldus amendment is not one of the question of the enforcement of the law. I do not think there is any question that every member of the Committee wants to see strong enforcement of these laws. They certainly want to see those who are violating the law removed from it.

The issue comes down to a question of developing a system by which the industry can survive without chaos. The difficulty with the Baldus amendment and the reason I offered my amendment in the full committee to make this change is one that is very simple.

Even though every State—and the Baldus amendment requires that each State adopt laws identical to the Federal laws—has the same statute, it comes down to the problem of how those laws are interpreted by the State courts. I think we are all aware of the difficulties that can arise with regard to court interpretations of laws, and I think there is little question that, with 50 different courts making interpretations of the same laws, it is very doubtful we are going to end up with a uniform law.

This is the reason I made a provision and a requirement that the States prosecute through the Federal courts, as opposed to prosecuting in the State courts. It is that simple.

With regard to the issue pertaining to the State's opportunity to prosecute, much has been said about the fact that today the Federal law precluded the States from taking action in this area. However, up until 1974, when the CFTC was created, the States had a virtual blank check with regard to this matter. States were allowed to pass their own laws, to bring about their own prosecutions, and to effect their own enforcements of those State laws. However, the reason why we have a CFTC is due to the fact that most States had not done so. Therefore, the Federal Government stepped into the breech and filled the gap to bring about a uniform law under which the industry could live. This is the reason we have the CFTC.

Mr. Chairman, under these circumstances I would think it would be obvious to all that we need a uniform enforcement. The only way we are going to get that kind of enforcement is through the Federal courts, with one Supreme Court making the interpretation of this law.

I would also suggest that we have in effect a new streamlined regulatory agency to regulate a giant industry. It is not one that has had 40 years to develop and evolve from a hodgepodge of State laws and Federal laws along with their interpretations. Without uniform enforcement through this new agency, we could face total chaos throughout the industry.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of the Baldus amendment.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I certainly want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ENGLISH).

I would just like to say that the reason the CFTC came about in the first place, as I understand it, and the reason exclusive jurisdiction was given the Federal Government was that we did have this plethora of interpretations of enforcements, not only in State supreme courts but even down in the local courts.

I think any reasonable reading of the committee bill would indicate that there is nothing in the bill that is going to keep a State from enforcing its fraud laws or its antifraud laws.

The additional argument that I think ought to be made here would simply state that, first of all, the States may be able to prosecute violations of the Commodity Exchange Act related to any transactions of commodities that are not traded on the exchanges. So we are talking about these other things, including the horror stories we have heard about this morning, such as the Lloyd, Carr case and the others, and the States would be able to prosecute in those situations in any event.

The second point is that the States may also be given authority to prosecute actions involving conventional trading on exchanges if the States can show that the general welfare is affected. That is provided in the bill.

Third, the bill makes it clear that the States may enforce their own criminal statutes in these areas. All those things are left to the States in any event.

The bill makes a real effort to preserve exclusive jurisdiction, while it does open up the opportunity and it actually frees up somewhat the opportunity for the States to enforce certain activities in their boundaries.

I think we should not get into a system of allowing the States to sue in State courts when we are talking about an exclusive Federal jurisdiction. There is nothing particularly wrong in suing and enforcing in the Federal courts, and I think the Federal law provides a guideline. The question is that some States are not permitted to do that by their own law and by their own constitution.

If that is the case, I would ask the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS) if it would not be just as easy for the State to pass a law allowing it to do that, as it would for the State to get a law through its legislature such as the gentleman's amendment would mandate. It would seem to me it would be just as easy.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, the bill modifies a bit the CFTC's exclusive jurisdiction to allow the State to assist in the prosecution of commodity fraud. That is really what I think the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS) is driving at.

Finally, I would argue that the Baldus amendment would in fact and in practice result in a plethora of State prosecutions, and even if they pass, as the Baldus amendment mandates, a law that is in the same wording of the Federal law, it would not keep the attorney general or the individual State's supreme court from interpreting it according to their own interpretation.

Commodity trading by nature is multi-State; that is, few commodity boards and few commodity transactions are restricted to within a single State. So we would have this multiplicity of interpretation even with regard to the transactions of a single company.

Mr. Chairman, I would urge the defeat of the Baldus amendment. This was something that was throughly discussed in both the full committee and in the subcommittee, and it has been a very technical area. I believe that the committee bill is the very best possible way to proceed to have a uniform enforcement, which I think is absolutely essential in this technical field.

Therefore, I urge the defeat of the Baldus amendment.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Baldus amendment.

I would just very briefly state that this is an enforcement-of-the-law issue, and I do not think we ought to ignore the fact that one of the great weaknesses of the CFTC has been in strong and vigorous enforcement of these laws.

The testimony before the subcommittee continually reiterated the fact that they are undermanned, that they do not have sufficient capability of getting out and enforcing and administering these laws. For that reason there was a consensus in the subcommittee, and I think there is a consensus among the members of the full committee that there is a need for strong enforcement in this area.

How do you improve that enforcement? The best vehicle available for expanding and improving the enforcement is to use the States' attorneys general. This is essentially what is done in the securities area. It is done by the States in insurance laws. I think there is no reason why we cannot expand it to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and its laws. That is the purpose of the Baldus amendment, to allow the States to take these matters into State courts.

The second point is that it does not create chaos because indeed we are requiring that it be uniform, that the States adopt uniform laws reflecting the Federal law and that they enforce those laws.

Third, and most importantly, there have been comments here that this can result in chaos and differences in interpretation.

Anyone who has practiced law knows that there are judges and there are judges. Judges make different decisions based on the same law, whether it is at the State level or at the Federal level. Those decisions can be appealed. There are appeal rights that can be exercised. But just because it is reserved to the Federal area does not mean you are not going to get different interpretations. Federal judges differ as to how they interpret Federal law. State judges may also differ. But that is the very nature of our process.

The main point is to try to maximize the enforcement of the law itself. I think the Baldus amendment helps in that direction, and that is why I support it.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to spend very long in debating this amendment.

I just want to urge my colleagues again to reject this amendment.

By the adoption of the amendment which I offered a few minutes ago, we have given the States the opportunity to go into Federal court and enforce provisions of the Commodity Exchange Act in Federal court. They cannot act against boards of trade, but they can act with respect to other violations of the statute in Federal court.

In order to avoid unnecessary complication, I think we ought to reject the Baldus amendment. The gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) said that 33 States are effectively prevented from going into Federal court. If that is correct—and I take the gentleman at his word—it is because of State law. The States would have to enact very complicated statutory provisions in order to conform to various parts of the Federal statutes. It would be easier for them to enact a simple provision relieving the Attorney General of any restraint that he has under State law which forbids going into Federal court.

Mr. Chairman, 17 States now have authority to go into Federal court, according to the gentleman's statistics, and they could act as soon as this statute is enacted to immediately begin to enforce Federal law in Federal courts.

Frankly, I think that there are not too many States of the 33 which will rush in and reenact the Federal statute. Maybe there are a number which will, but it seems that the simpler thing is merely to remove any statutory limitation on the Attorney General or any present legal obstacles to entering Federal court so as to enforce the Federal statutes.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment simply does not do what we all want to do.

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, on the point of a certain amount of the States having difficulties in getting into Federal court, I rely on what the States' securities commissioners said with respect to their difficulty in getting into Federal court. I presume it might be State law; but, in many cases, it is also the State constitution which prohibits them from doing that. That is a very difficult thing to overcome.

On the other hand, the States' securities commissioners are accustomed to going to State legislatures and saying, "The Federal law has changed. We can do better by having our State laws conform so that we do not have two different laws."

That is something which goes on in State legislatures regularly. That is why the National Association of State Legislatures said that this is a preferable way to do it, allowing them to make their law identical to ours.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comments.

I am sure that we ought to and will give due weight to the opinion of the National Association of State Legislatures as to how the Federal law should be drafted; but the final responsibility for drafting it lies with us.

While I say we should take respectful notice of their opinion, I am concerned that we might have some situations in which there would be unnecessary duplication and possible conflict in interpretation.

Mr. Chairman, some Members have said that this same language is going to be interpreted in different ways. We have appeals courts constantly making judgments that lower courts of the same system have misinterpreted the language of the law. This amendment creates the very real possibility of several different courts examining and interpreting the same language and arriving at different interpretations of identical statutes. Certainly, that will raise some serious problems with respect to regulatory enforcement.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr GLICKMAN. There is another point: Pragmatically and historically, States attorneys general and securities commissioners have not and do not go into Federal court to enforce these kinds of statutes. That is because of history, policy, or law, they feel much more comfortable in going into State courts to seek the immediate kind of relief necessary to enjoin the kind of action taking place.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope my remarks are not taken as being disrespectful. I used to be an assistant State attorney general. However, I am puzzled by this constant repetition of the statement that there is somehow a cultural hangup on the part of State officials which keeps them from going into Federal court, that in addition to legal restraints, they just cannot bear to get inside a Federal courtroom, and that somehow a kind of historic reticence or confusion occurs when a State official gets into the Federal courts. They obviously go into Federal courts all the time as defendants.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, no State would hesitate, for one moment, in sending its legal officers into Federal court when the State's interests were deemed to be adversely affected by some action in Federal court.

Why is it, that we are asked to have such a great concern for the historic reluctance of these States to enter Federal court, while at the same time we are told that they are energetically seeking a role in enforcement? They want enforcement of the same kind of statute, but they say, "We do not want to do that in Federal court." Apparently, they just do not feel comfortable.

Mr. GLICKMAN. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I do not know the answer to the question, but I would submit that the historic practice has led to a situation in which they feel that they cannot go into the Federal courts. They feel they can get faster and more expeditious, more equitable relief in the State courts.

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman is saying they prefer to go into State courts.

Mr. GLICKMAN. That may be their way to get faster and more equitable relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. FOLEY was allowed to proceed for 4 additional minutes.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. It has worked reasonably well in the Federal securities area to prevent that kind of fraudulent conduct from mushrooming. At least, they stop there in an earlier inception of the proceedings. I just think the Baldus amendment offers a better opportunity to prevent it from mushrooming before it gets out of my county and into my Nation.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from yielding to me.

No. 1, assuming the gentleman's statistics to be correct, is it not the case, then, in the 33 States to which he has made reference, that an act of the legislature in those 33 and in the other 17 States would be necessary in order for those States to have State laws comparable to the Federal law?

No. 2, is it not also true that an action of the legislature, then, in those 33 States could remove the prohibition that keeps them from going into Federal court? The same legislative bodies would have to take an action in either case.

Finally, No. 3, is it not true that by taking that action then, the State legislatures could empower their attorneys general or security commissioners or whoever to enforce security violations if, in fact, they want them to do that—which apparently they have not been up to this point. Are those conclusions in error?

Mr. FOLEY. I share those conclusions. I think the gentleman is correct.

Mr. MADIGAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to point out that there could be consequences. The problem and difficulty we have had is that up until 1974 the States had sole authority. They could do anything they wanted to in this area. They could pass all kinds of laws and have all kinds of enforcement. The fact of the matter is that they did not do it. That is the reason we are standing here with this legislation.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is not really a fair statement, because the futures markets in terms of the broad ramifications really did not begin to mushroom until the early 1970's.

Mr. ENGLISH. That is exactly the point. We are getting it now. We have an enormous industry. It is not the one that was back in the 1930's, whenever we had the Securities Exchange Commission, when we allowed the involvement of law in a very small industry group. It is a giant industry now. We are dealing with a giant industry and the gentleman is suggesting that we go back to the same problems we had. But, we do not have 40 years. We cannot allow irreparable harm to this industry.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Regardless of which way we go on this amendment, giving the States the power to enforce fraudulent violations of commodities futures laws is not going to be irreparable harm to the industry, because they are not able to be involved in the rulemaking process. There may be a policy judgment, but I do not think anybody can successfully contend that this will involve irreparable harm to the industry.

Mr. ENGLISH. I believe the chaos that would be created as a result of 50 different laws would certainly work damage on the industry. I do not think there is any question about that.

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the American investor deserves more protection against fraud than the CFTC provides. I rise in support of the Baldus amendment to H.R. 10285, the Commodity Exchange Act Extension. This amendment would allow States to enforce the antifraud provisions of the act now loosely enforced at the Federal level. State jurisdiction is necessary to combat dealer fraud.

The need for State enforcement authority stems from current CFTC activities. The Commodity Exchange Act, enacted in 1974, gave exclusive jurisdiction for antifraud violation enforcement to the CFTC. But, enforcement has been lax and States have been prevented from filling the void. The absence of Federal interest has fostered the growth of a commodities trading subculture directed by unprincipled operators in search of a fast buck.

The Lloyd, Carr & Co. case involving the sale of London options is the most well-known case of widespread fraud. Its Massachusetts history illustrates the scope of the problem.

James A. Carr, later identified as a convicted felon and escapee from a New Jersey prison, successfully operated a commodities trading company in Boston for 18 months prior to its shutdown late last year. While skirting Federal law and defying the U.S. courts, Carr bilked 45,000 Massachusetts investors out of $12 million. The Massachusetts securities division finally shut down Lloyd, Carr & Co. based on two legal technicalities—failure to register with the secretary of the Commonwealth as required of any Massachusetts business and parens patriae injunctive relief.

The existence of 12 branch offices of Lloyd, Carr & Co. guaranteed nationwide repercussions for the large boilerroom shop marked by high-pressure sales tactics, false promises and exorbitant fees. Carr's lawyer estimated nationwide sales at $25 to $27 million in 1977. Carr faces proceedings in 12 States and Federal courts based on fraudulent and deceptive sales practices.

The Commodity Futures Trading Commission neither has nor has sought the staff and means to effectively enforce the CFTC Act. Enactment of the Baldus amendment, giving States authority to pass and enforce State laws identical to Federal commodity statutes, would result in increased enforcement capacity by State securities administrators.

Opponents of the Baldus amendment claim this would lead to differing State interpretations of the law. States would only be permitted to pass language identical to that in the Federal statute. In addition, State law must include the following sentence:

> In any such action, Federal law, including the decisions of the Federal courts and the decisions and published interpretations of the commission, shall be controlling.

And, the CFTC must be promptly notified of any action and given the right to intervene in any proceedings.

Similar overlapping jurisdiction in securities antifraud law illustrates implementation with the Baldus amendment in force. All States have antifraud laws identical or nearly identical to section 10(B) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 which states that it is illegal to engage in manipulative or deceptive actions contrary to SEC rules. Though there is no mandate in the SEC statute that Federal law would be controlling, State interpretations have been nearly identical without the mandate the Baldus amendment enacts. In the view of the Security and Exchange Commission's Assistant Director of Enforcement, the State and Federal interpretations of identical or nearly identical antifraud provisions are a model.

Mr. Chairman, the Baldus amendment has been endorsed by the North American Securities Administrators Association and was accepted by the five CFTC commissioners during subcommittee consideration. I urge my colleagues to vote for this amendment. With its enactment, commodities exchange laws will be enforced. Without the Baldus amendment, Federal enforcement will remain haphazard and commodities options scandals are likely to continue.

The purpose of this act is to protect the public from the type of fraud that has occurred across the Nation and has reached scandalous proportions and caused innocent investors to lose millions of dollars. In fairness to industry their point of view has been considered in our deliberations and a single standard of interpretation has been set by the Baldus amendment and in fairness to the public we should give the States the same option to enforce the law and protect the product which has been so sorely needed and has been requested by the State legislators across the country.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. BALDUS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BALDUS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 141, noes 260, not voting 31, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Jenrette for, with Mr. Shipley against.

Mrs. Meyner for, with Mr. Teague against.

Mr. Fraser for, with Mrs. Collins of Illinois against.

Messrs. LENT, BLANCHARD, ASHLEY, and FOUNTAIN changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

Messrs. MICHEL, DUNCAN of Oregon, and ROUSSELOT changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to section 12? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

LIMITATION ON DISCLOSURE TO THE PUBLIC OF NAMES AND POSITIONS OF TRADERS ON BOARDS OF TRADE

SEC. 13. Section 8 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 12–1) is amended by—

(1) inserting in the first sentence "but subject to the limitations set forth below," after "discretion";

(2) striking out in the first sentence ", except data and information which would separately disclose the business transactions of any person and trade secrets or names of customers" and inserting in lieu thereof ": Provided, however, That, nothwithstanding the foregoing, the Commission shall not disclose publicly or publish any data or information which would separately disclose the market positions, business transactions, trade secrets, or names of customers of any person unless such data or information has been previously disclosed publicly in a judicial or congressional proceeding";

(3) striking out in the first sentence ": Provided further, That the Commission in any report may include facts as to any actual transaction";

(4) striking out in the second paragraph "from time to time" and inserting in lieu thereof "but only after such information has otherwise been publicly disclosed in a judicial or congressional proceeding,";

(5) striking out in the second paragraph "and make public" the second time that phrase appears and inserting in lieu thereof "on a confidential basis."

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that section 13 be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. RICHMOND

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RICHMOND: Page 16, lines 10 and 18, insert "an administrative proceeding pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended," immediately before "a judicial" in each such line;

Page 16, strike out lines 12 through 14 and insert in lieu thereof:

"(3) inserting in the first sentence", except that any facts that are subject to the restrictions on public disclosure hereinabove set forth may be included in such report only after such facts have otherwise been publicly disclosed in an administrative proceeding pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, a judicial or Congressional proceeding" after ": Provided further, That the Commission in any report may include facts as to any actual transaction";

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, this amendment seeks to clarify the intent of an amendment I added to the committee bill, which is now before us.

In that amendment I specified that the Commission be prohibited from disclosing confidential, market sensitive information or identifying traders or their customers until such information has been publicly disclosed in a judicial or congressional proceeding.

However, other kinds of proceedings exist which are quasi-judicial or official in some capacity, where such information must be disclosed during the course of the proceedings. The first part of my amendment addresses this issue by adding a third category of proceeding to those covered already: Formal administrative procedures pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended.

An example of this kind of procedure would be a disciplinary hearing by the Commission, or other hearings for the purpose of imposing civil penalties for violations of the act. Certainly, where confidential information must become public during the course of this kind of procedure, CFTC should have the ability to fully disclose all the facts of the case, while protecting other persons about whom information does not need to be publicly disclosed.

This language is supported by the Commission, which feels that this authority is necessary if it is to fully participate in the various regulatory and other official proceedings involving this act.

The second part of the amendment further clarifies my committee amendment by authorizing the CFTC to make public the facts of the case after any proceedings are completed, where such information has been disclosed, while prohibiting the Commission from making confidential materials public when they have not been disclosed during such hearings or proceedings.

I might say, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is not a blanket authority for the Commission to disclose confidential information about persons outside the scope of any judicial, administrative or congressional proceedings. My amendment is designed to operate solely within the context of these proceedings.

I urge my colleagues' support for these clarifications, which, I believe, will make the CFTC's procedures more effective, and give the public necessary information about the Commission's activities.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHMOND. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, we have reviewed the gentleman's amendment on this side. I think it is consistent with the purpose of the amendment which he offered in the full committee and which was adopted in that committee.

Mr. Chairman, we have no objections to the amendment on this side and urge the committee to support it.

Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHMOND. I yield to the gentleman from Washington, the distinguished chairman of the committee.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the gentleman's amendment on this side.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. RICHMOND).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to section 13?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. COHEN

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COHEN: Page 16, after line 21, insert the following new section:

POTATO FUTURES STUDY

SEC. 14. Section 8 of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new undesignated paragraph:

"Within one year after the date this paragraph becomes effective, the Comptroller General of the United States shall—

"(1) conduct a comprehensive study of the marketing of Irish potatoes and of the making and trading of contracts for the purchase or sale of Irish potatoes for future delivery, including rules and regulations pertaining to such trading issued by the Commission or any board of trade; and

"(2) submit to each House of Congress a detailed report on the results of such study. Such report shall also include any proposals the Comptroller General may have concerning any legislation needed to implement such recommendations and concerning any modifications and rules and regulations needed to improve regulation of such contracts by the Commission or any board of trade.".

Redesignate the subsequent sections accordingly.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Chairman, I have followed the deliberation on H.R. 10285 with a great deal of interest. As many of my colleagues know, Maine potato futures have been traded extensively on the New York Mercantile Exchange for better than two decades. In 1976 and 1977, just under 1 million potato futures contracts were traded on the exchange. The estimated "value" of these contracts is in the neighborhood of $1.7 billion.

A properly regulated futures market can offer many advantages for the potato industry. In addition to providing an added marketing option, futures trading provides an opportunity for potato growers, shippers, processors, and retailers to protect margins, establish costs, and reduce the risk of unfavorable price fluctuations. Prudent use of the futures market can also open up new avenues of credit for the producer as well as strengthen his bargaining leverage with those he does business with.

Despite its theoretical advantages, many Maine growers remain dubious of the value of futures trading. On several occasions in recent years, a substantial percentage of Maine growers have voiced their support for a permanent ban on trading. This view reflects the belief that futures trading disrupts orderly marketing, adversely affects prices in the cash market, and generally puts at a disadvantage the small grower who does not use the futures market. Equally important, many growers feel that market manipulation and abusive trading practices are commonplace, and that the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and the New York Mercantile Exchange have done little to check such activities. Still others blame the CFTC for the 1976 potato futures default, and are critical of the exchange for failing to enforce its rules in a manner which is fair to all with positions in the market.

At the same time, there are others in the industry who vigorously defend the practice of trading potatoes on the futures market. In general, these individuals believe that the existence of an alternative marketing mechanism is of proven economic value to the industry. Additionally, proponents argue that without the price protection afforded by futures trading, many producers would have been driven out of business in recent years due to depressed prices.

Let me add at this point that I do not believe that all the ills facing the Maine potato industry can be fairly placed on the doorstep of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission or the New York Mercantile Exchange. Problems of quality and overproduction are matters which only the industry can superintend. Moreover, the CFTC and the futures market bear little or no blame for the increasingly serious transportation problems facing the Maine potato industry. To make the CFTC the focal point for criticism ignores other equally relevant factors which have led to the loss of markets over the years and fostered lower prices for growers. I am not suggesting that the futures market is perfect. No market is. To the contrary, I believe that the concerns that the grower community in Maine has raised for years deserve the immediate attention of the Congress, the CFTC, and the exchange. As many Members know, the General Accounting Office recently issued an extensive report which was highly critical of the program activities and management functions of the CFTC. Certain concerns expressed by Maine potato growers over the years are validated by the Comptroller General's report. For those unfamiliar with the report, the GAO found that:

The CFTC's initial market designation reviews were not comprehensive enough to insure that only contract markets meeting statutory and Commission requirements were designated;

There is an overriding need on the part of the CFTC to improve its rule enforcement procedures;

The Commission's registration program is not as effective as it could be in preventing unfit and unqualified individuals and firms from being registered and reregistered;

There is possible underrepresentation of the interest of the general public and possible overrepresentation of the industry in the appointment of outside advisory committees;

A need exists to intensify efforts especially in the areas of regulating dual trading, trading standards, and time stamping of transactions;

The Commission's market surveillance activities are inadequate to detect and prevent disruptions such as price manipulations;

The CFTC has not strictly enforced its requirements that exchanges pass an economic purpose test by providing that proposed contracts can reasonably be expected to be used for pricing or hedging purposes;

The CFTC may not be fully implementing the section of the law which specifically requires that exchanges must demonstrate before market designation that futures trading in proposed contracts would not be contrary to the public interest; and

The Commission's audits have not been sufficiently frequent and may not be complete enough to insure that customers' funds are adequately protected.

Without question, these troubling findings will only further fuel the dispute over potato futures trading. To a considerable extent, they serve to confirm the fact that the 1976 potato futures default resulted from management and program deficiencies at the CFTC and the New York Mercantile Exchange. Until corrective measures are taken—and H.R. 10285 represents a positive effort in that direction—the possibility of a recurrence of the 1976 refault cannot be ruled out.

In recent weeks, I have spent considerable time reviewing the arguments for and against potato futures trading. Last week, I dispatched a member of my leglislative staff to Maine to meet with potato industry officials on the question. Based on these efforts, I am convinced that a full-scale review of potato futures trading is both necessary and warranted.

Originally, I had intended to offer an amendment to H.R. 10285 which would have suspended trading pending the outcome of a GAO study of potato futures. The Parliamentarian's Office has informed me that such an amendment would not be germane to the purposes of H.R. 10285 and therefore subject to a point of order.

The ruling does not, however, in any way diminish the need for a thorough and impartial study of the practice of trading Maine potatoes on the futures market. As long as the practice is viewed with grave suspicion by a substantial number of Maine growers—and that remains the case today—the issue will continue to divide the industry and deflect attention and energy away from other equally serious problems.

It is time that we lay to rest the festering controversy over potato futures trading by commissioning a credible and unbiased report on the practice. Therefore, I am hopeful that my efforts to secure a GAO study of potato futures trading will be strongly supported by the chairman of the Agriculture Committee. Such interest on the part of the committee will clearly demonstrate to the members of the Maine potato industry that Congress is truly interested in resolving this most complex and controversial question in a manner which is fair to all.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any enormous harm in having a GAO study, but on the other hand I dislike setting a precedent which would statutorily direct the General Accounting Office to do the study on a contract market when, to my knowledge, there has been no direct request to the General Accounting Office from any Member of Congress to conduct the study. The gentleman, I am sure, is concerned, as are other colleagues from the delegation from Maine here and in the other body, about the Irish potato futures contracts and the operation of those contracts in the State of Maine. Indeed, there has been an historic concern, as the gentleman knows, of producers in the State of Maine, many of whom are opposed to futures trading.

But again, there is nothing to prevent the General Accounting Office from responding to a request from a Member of Congress to conduct such an investigation if the Comptroller General feels it is appropriate. I hesitate to instruct the Comptroller General by statutory language to conduct this survey or investigation when he has not been asked to conduct it or given a chance to review the need for such an investigation.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Chairman, I simply point out that the law already provides that the Comptroller General of the United States shall conduct reviews and audits of the Commission, and make reports thereon. It would simply expand that to deal with a specific segment of the industry. As I indicated, a bill has been filed to ban trading altogether. I think before we go forward, we ought to have some facts established by an impartial, unbiased investigative unit.

This seems to me to be the appropriate way to proceed.

Mr. FOLEY. I certainly agree that before a proposal to ban trading should go forward, it certainly should be subjected to analysis and review.

I share the gentleman's respect for the Comptroller General and the General Accounting Office. All I am saying is that we are jumping in with a mandate to the Comptroller General to make a study he has not previously been requested to do. The present law authorizes study and review and perhaps we might indicate this is an appropriate subject for study.

Mr. COHEN. Would the chairman agree to request such a study by the General Accounting Office?

Mr. FOLEY. The gentleman can do that himself. Of course if the Committee on Agriculture asks for it, I will transmit that request to the Comptroller General.

My only concern is establishing a precedent of statutorily directing the Comptroller General to conduct investigations and studies when he has not been given an opportunity to review and act upon a request. The normal way of initiating a General Accounting Office investigation would be to make a request.

Mr. COHEN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, it seems to me it is a serious matter and it is entirely appropriate for the GAO to conduct a study, and before proceeding with legislation which has been introduced in the other body that we should have the facts. If the committee would request such a study, it seems to me it would be quite appropriate and in accordance with the legislation.

Mr. FOLEY. The General Accounting Office has undertaken investigations on many occasions on request of individual Members of Congress, not just on the request of committees.

I am not aware of any such request having been made. Until the Comptroller General has had an opportunity to review such a request, I question the propriety of directing such a study in the statute.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I wanted to clarify with the gentleman from Maine that his amendment in no way would make any inference toward suspending of trading in potato futures.

Mr. COHEN. That is true. The only purpose would be to have the General Accounting Office make a study during the next year and file its findings with the Congress. Then when we consider the legislation next year, their findings will be before the Congress.

I would be happy to request such a study if we had the agreement of the committee. If we pass such an amendment, if the General Accounting Office indicates it will be willing to conduct such a study in accordance with the request of any individual member, that would be fine, but it seems to me this is the only proposal we have before us now.

Mr. SYMMS. I would say to the gentleman and members of the committee that in my State and the gentleman's State the trading in potato futures is a very emotional issue, witnessed by the legislation introduced in the other body. I personally think the legislation introduced to ban trading in potato futures would only hurt the small farmers who could use the futures as a hedge in their marketing of potatoes and it is the only alternative to the processor or fresh market the farmer has as a market. If the General Accounting Office would come out with a study which would be fair and shed some light on the matter, there might be less emotionalism on this subject, and I think the gentleman is on the right track. I support his amendment.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the gentleman.

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage in a colloquy with the author of the amendment, the gentleman from Maine (Mr. COHEN).

First of all, for the record, will the gentleman clarify the use of the term "Irish potato" as used in his amendment?

Mr. COHEN. It is a generic term.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman would yield, let me just say that it means the best kind.

Mrs. HECKLER. I thank the gentleman and I would have assumed as much.

Further, concerning the unhappiness of the Maine potato growers in the gentleman's State, as a result of their lengthy experience with futures trading in potatoes, I would appreciate further details on this question.

Mr. COHEN. If the gentlewoman will yield, there have been a number of surveys taken of the growers, and a majority of the growers have indicated that they are opposed to a continuing of futures trading, because they feel that the market has been subject to manipulation, and that there have been gross fluctuations in the market itself and a great many abuses have occurred in the past to their detriment. There are those who have been quite successful in the use of the futures trading in order to hedge their potato crops, and protect their investments. But there is a continuing controversy, as I indicated during the general statement I made, and because of the continuing controversies, various measures have been introduced to ban trading altogether. Initially I proposed to suspend trading during the course of the study, but I found out that this would not be permissible in this bill, so I thought that a reasonable alternative would be to have the GAO, which is a highly respected body, make their recommendation to this Congress within 1 year from the enactment of the law and, therefore, we would have a proper foundation to make an intelligent assessment when the matter comes to the Congress.

Mrs. HECKLER. With reference to the problems experienced by the Maine potato growers, I understand that the Idaho potato growers have raised the same concerns, is that correct?

Mr. COHEN. That is right.

Mrs. HECKLER. Therefore this is a national problem.

Mr. COHEN. That is correct.

Mrs. HECKLER. Mr. Chairman, frankly I am persuaded by the gentleman's statement and believe that there is great merit to his proposed amendment. I congratulate the gentleman from Maine (Mr. COHEN) for bringing this important issue to the floor of the House. I intend to support the gentleman's amendment, because I feel that rather than supporting a total ban on futures trading in this particular commodity, the Congress would be better advised to proceed on the basis of an objective study which would be forthcoming from the GAO as the result of this mandate.

Mr. COHEN. I thank the gentlewoman from Massachusetts (Mrs. HECKLER) for her comments.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine (Mr. COHEN).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to section 13 of the bill? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

FINGERPRINTING OF APPLICANTS FOR REGISTRATION; LIMITATION ON PUBLICATION OF CERTAIN INFORMATION

SEC. 14. Section 8a of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 12a(1)) is amended by—

(1) inserting in subsection (1) after "by the Commission" the following: ", which may require the applicant, and any persons associated with the applicant as the Commission may specify, to be fingerprinted and to submit, or cause to be submitted, such fingerprints to the Attorney General of the United States for identification and appropriate processing".

(2) striking out in subsection (6) "and to publish".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of section 14 be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 14?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CRIMINAL PENALTIES

SEC. 15. Section 9 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13) is amended by—

(1) inserting before the period at the end of subsection (b) the following: ", or to knowingly violate the provisions of section 4, section 4b, section 4h, or section 40(1) of this Act, or to knowingly make any false or misleading statement of a material fact in any registration application or report filed with the Commission".

(2) striking out subsection (c) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Except as provided in subsections (a), (b), (d), and (e) of this section, it shall be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $100,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, together with the costs of prosection, for any person to violate any provisions of section 4a, section 4c, section 4d, section 4e, section 4i, section 4k, section 4m, section 4o(2), or section 8b, or to fail to evidence any contract mentioned in section 4 of this Act by a record in writing as therein required.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of section 15 be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 15?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PANETTA

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PANETTA: Page 17, line 19, delete "(2)" and insert in lieu thereof "(3)"; and

Page 17, delete lines 13 through 18, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) in subsection (a), by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000"; and by inserting immediately after the first sentence the following new sentence: "Notwithstanding the foregoing, in the case of any violation described in the foregoing sentence by a futures commission merchant, or any employee or agent thereof who is an individual, the fine shall not be more than $100,000, together with the costs of prosecution.";

(2) in subsection (b), by striking out "$100,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$500,000"; and by inserting before the period at the end of subsection (b) the following: ", or to knowingly violate the provisions of section 4, section 4b, section 4h, or section 4o(1) of this Act, or to knowingly make any false or misleading statement of a material fact in any registration application or report filed with the Commission. Notwithstanding the foregoing, in the case of any violation described in the foregoing sentence by a person who is an individual the fine shall not be more than $100,000, together with the costs of prosecution "; and

Mr. PANETTA (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will bring the criminal penalties enforced by the Commodities Trading Commission in line with those of the Securities and Exchange Commission, by increasing the maximum criminal penalty for a felony committed by an organization from $100,000 to a maximum of $500,000.

Testimony before the subcommittee confirmed that futures trading industry has expanded tremendously so that trading now exceeds something like a trillion dollars, and much of this trading is highly speculative. Obviously, the potential for fraud and abuse in this area has increased as a result.

The impact of fraud in the futures trading industry can be felt not only in agriculture but in our national economy as a whole. The CFTC itself has confirmed through testimony before the subcommittee that there is a need to differentiate between the penalties for misdemeanors and felonies; otherwise there is no deterrent; there is no difference between the two.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Just speaking for myself, I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Am I correct in assuming that the only change that the gentleman is making is to increase to $500,000 the penalty where a criminal violation has occurred?

Mr. PANETTA. That is correct.

Mr. MADIGAN. And that fine would be assessed only against an organization? If it were an individual, the fine would not be escalated to $500,000?

Mr. PANETTA. That is correct.

Mr. MADIGAN. Am I also correct in assuming, then, that that provision is the same as the provision in the Securities and Exchange Commission laws?

Mr. PANETTA. It is in line with exactly what the Securities and Exchange Commission now requires.

Mr. MADIGAN. I do not feel we have any objection.

Mr. PANETTA. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PANETTA. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. I thank my good friend, the gentleman from California, for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. I have been visited by a number of industry officials about this amendment and not all of them are concerned that the Panetta penalties are too high. In fact, this amendment is more limited than the legislative recommendations of the CFTC.

It appears to me that we should make some distinctions in penalties between misdemeanors and felonies. Another important distinction the Panetta amendment makes is that between individuals and organizations. I submit that, as a deterrent, a $500,000 fine is not out of line for some of the wealthy firms, exchanges, and contract markets in this industry.

I believe this is a fair and just, and balanced amendment and urge my colleagues to support it.

Mr. PANETTA. I thank my good friend, the gentleman from Tennessee, chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. PANETTA).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any further amendments to section 15 of the bill? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 16. Section 12(d) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 16(d)) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act such sums as may be required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, for the period beginning July 1, 1975, and ending September 30, 1976, and for each of the fiscal years beginning October 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1981, and not in excess of such sums as may, after the date of enactment of this subsection, be authorized by law for any subsequent fiscal year.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of section 16 be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 16?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REPARATIONS PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 17. Section 14 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 18) is amended by—

(1) striking out "registered" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "who is registered or should be registered";

(2) striking out "$2,500" in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000"; and

(3) striking out "$2,500" in subsection (c) wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof $5,000".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of section 17 be dispensed with, and that it be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 17? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATIONS

SEC. 18. Section 17 of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding a new subsection (n) as follows:

"(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commission may approve rules of futures associations that, directly or indirectly, require persons eligible for membership in such associations to become members of at least one such association, upon a determination by the Commission that such rules are necessary or appropriate to achieve the purposes and objectives of this Act.".

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of section 18 be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there any amendments to section 18 of the bill?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SMITH OF IOWA

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SMITH of Iowa: Page 19 between lines 12 and 13, insert the following: The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding the following new section:

"SEC. 19. Any person who sells any commodity (as defined in section 2 of this Act) for export shall, within forty-eight hours after such sale, inform the Commission of (1) the date of such sale, (2) the name and full identity of the commodity sold, (3) the quantity of the commodity sold, (4) the name of the buyer and the country or countries to which the commodity is to be shipped, (5) the sale price, and (6) such other information as the Commission may by regulation require. The Commission shall by regulation prescribe the manner in which the above information shall be transmitted. On the first working day following its receipt, such information shall be made available by public announcement and shall remain available for public inspection for a reasonable time thereafter. The Commission shall prescribe regulations to assure that such information shall be disclosed simultaneously to the public and to protect against any person or firm gaining from premature disclosure.".

Mr. SMITH of Iowa (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, first of all, I want to commend the committee for this legislation. I think the Commodities Exchange Act, passed in 1974, has avoided some major scandals and major abuses that would have occurred. It is not easy to prove that which did not occur, but I am sure that that is a safe statement. This extension is needed, and I think the committee has done a very good job on this bill.

However, I think there are three areas in which potential for great harm still exists; one is in the area of options. I think the committee in the section 2 dealt with options as good as they can be dealt with at the present time. The other is an area of leverage, and I am hopeful before the conference report is passed that perhaps something will be done about leverage contracts.

The other has to do with a continuing problem with regard to double hedging. There are speculative limits and speculative limits for most grain is 3 million bushels, but international traders have ways to avoid speculative limits. They can, for example, fail to hedge their cash positions. Most of them own country elevators and they can simply not hedge their cash positions. They can, on the other hand, uncover some cash positions which they had previously hedged.

They have other ways that are really disturbing. One is that a big grain company with a subsidiary in a foreign country can merely say they are selling some grain and that the buyer is a foreign subsidiary. Then without regard to the speculative limits, they cover the entire amount and call it a hedge.

There is almost no limit to the amount they can hedge in this manner.

If they have some secret information that only they and the state trading company in Russia or somewhere has, they have information that others do not have indicating a change in the market. In that way, if they are getting a 2- or 3-week period to cover the sale, they can "hedge" and transfer back on to the American market at enormous cost the results from selling grain for less than it was really worth, due to the fact that only they and the state trading company in the country knew the real demand and the real value of the grain at that time.

In other words, what they really do, and it has been done several times, they enter into a contract with a state grain company in another country and before Americans know the real demand and the real value of the grain, they go on to our board of trade and hedge there at the lower price than what the grain is really worth, an enormous amount of grain.

In the case of the big Russian wheat sale, they bought 30 million tons, when they knew they only needed 20 million. It was the greatest bargain there ever was. They "hedged" it on our Boards of Trade and the cost was paid by our industry and consumers and then they dumped the excess the next year and hurt our market. But in the end they bought 30 million tons for less than it should have cost them to buy 10 million tons; so after using 20 million tons and selling the excess, they had food in their stomachs and their pockets lined with gold.

This amendment says:

Look, an exporter claims it is hedging, and is able to avoid the speculative limits and put it onto the traders in our country, then they must within 48 hours tell us who their customer is in that foreign country.

I do not think that is an unreasonable requirement.

Now, I will submit, because the information is released a day later, it still gives them about 3 days in which to hedge these sales. They can still hedge a substantial amount of grain in 3 days, but at least it will not be the present situation where they get a chance to hedge, cover, and speculate for about 20 days and transfer great costs onto our markets for about 20 days before Americans know about it.

This kind of provision passed once before in the House. It went to conference in the Senate and was knocked out in the conference. Since then they tried voluntary late reporting, but it is not adequate.

I think the least we can do is reduce the damage that can be done. Just as sure as I am standing here, abuses will occur again and again until we at least let the traders in this country know what the real demand is for the product within 3 days and give them the opportunity to partially reduce the damage that can be done.

A country can have a drought. They can just simply, if they want to, enter into a plan with an exporter trading on our futures market to make some money. The violation would be unprovable or would be in a foreign country, and we could not do anything about it. In one way or another, they could transfer the cost on to people who are using the markets in this country for legitimate purposes.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I understand the concern the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) is expressing, and it is a concern that I share.

As I understand it, what the gentleman would do is he would actually protect the farmer who is not in a position to engage in all of the speculation that other people are, people who have knowledge that the average farmer does not have. The gentleman from Iowa is ambitious to see that all of this information is made public so that farmers do not sell their commodities for less than what they might actually be worth if the public was aware of what was going on. I think that is a proper concern, and I think there is a proper place in which to express that concern.

However, I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) and to the members of the committee that this is not that place. The problem that we have presently with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission is that it is already understaffed to do the jobs it has already been charged with the responsibility of doing.

The greatest problem expressed by the representatives of the Commission when they appeared before our subcommittee and our committee is their problem with the Committee on Appropriations in getting adequate money and adequate staff to enforce the laws they are already required to enforce.

Providing them with an additional responsibility is not going to assist the Commission in becoming a good functioning agency.

I would also like to point this out to the gentleman from Iowa and to the members of the committee: The kinds of reports that the gentleman would require to be filed with the Commodity Futures Trading Commission are already required to be filed with the U.S. Department of Agriculture. The proper way to approach this and accomplish what the gentleman would like to do would be, in my opinion, to offer an amendment to a bill dealing with the U.S. Department of Agriculture that would require that Department to release the information that is already being provided to it. That would accomplish the objective the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) seeks to accomplish. That would be the proper place in which to engage in this debate.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit that this is not the place to consider this amendment, and that this Commission does not have adequate manpower to engage in a further responsibility such as the gentleman would assign to it.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADIGAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. First of all, Mr. Chairman, on the question of manpower, we did put the manpower into the appropriation bill which passed the House. They are going to have the manpower.

Second, the CFTC is the agency that needs this information in order to adequately perform the other duties it has. To file the information with the Department of Agriculture and have it become known 20 days later is nice for historical purposes, but it does not do much to remedy the problem that grain traders as well as farmers have with getting information too late that a foreign country and one of our big grain companies already have.

So this, I think, is the appropriate place for the amendment. We could abolish the requirement to file down in the Department of Agriculture, and all it would do would be to deny them a little of their historical data they print, but that would not do much else.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's suggestion, but I continue to believe that the proper course of action would be to discuss whether or not the Department of Agriculture should be required to release that information which it is already collecting and which is already required by law to be reported to it.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have the greatest respect for the distinguished gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH). There are many issues involving agriculture on which we agree, but there are instances in which we do not.

I do agree with the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. MADIGAN) that H.R. 10285 is not a proper bill on which to attach this amendment. The Department of Agriculture has under way a study of the need to revise the reporting requirements of sales of agricultural commodities, and it is required under other legislation recently reported by the Committee on Agriculture to conclude that study promptly and submit its report to the Congress.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope we would not place this particular requirement in the bill at this time, and I urge my colleagues to vote "no" on the amendment.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members will consider the content of the rhetoric regarding this amendment, not just the specific language of the amendment, because nobody seems to really find any fault with the language of the amendment. The same thing can be said about other amendments which tried to accomplish the goals this amendment seeks that have been brought up in the Committee on Agriculture earlier this year.

Mr. Chairman, we constantly hear sympathy expressed for what we are trying to do or we constantly hear, "Well, it ought to be done, but not now. We ought to have a study and see how that study comes out." Or that it ought to be done on some other bill or with some other agency. That is all we ever hear about this amendment. Nobody ever attacks what the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) is trying to do or what anybody else tries to do along this line, but the opposition always tries to delay it or they have some other objection. That tells me that what the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) is trying to do is good and that he is on the right track.

Although I did not hear it myself because I was not a Member of Congress then, I have read the history of the previous attempts to do this sort of thing, and 4 or 5 years ago the same rhetoric took place, particularly, "Let the Department of Agriculture study it."

The Department of Agriculture said in 1973, when present reporting requirements were put on the books, "Well, let us wait awhile."

And then the bill was passed anyway, and they started to do it. Now attempts to close loopholes have been met with the same argument: "Well, let's wait a little while before we do it."

Mr. Chairman, the time has come. In May 1977, there was a General Accounting Office report that went into great depth recommending some of these things be done that the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) is trying to accomplish.

If for no other reason, if you talk to your farmers back home about this amendment, you should support it. You cannot talk to very many until you find out that they are just filled with the intuition that people who are connected with the big grain companies or with the Department of Agriculture know more of what is going on in the grain trade than the individual farmer does. The producers and marketers of their products feel they ought to have this information, the same way that the insiders with the grain companies and the insiders of the Department of Agriculture have it. All the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) is trying to do with this amendment is to get this information out—maybe not solely for the reason to make it public even though that is a worthy goal, but more importantly so the impact of those sales is made on the market more immediately.

So I suggest to the Members that they just ask their farmers back in their district what those farmers think about getting more of this information out, and the Members will find that the farmers think they are as much entitled to this information as anybody connected with the grain trades or the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, the only people in opposition to this, as was brought out in the hearings which were held by the Department Operations subcommittee, are those connected with the big grain companies. I would assume, although they did not testify, probably the speculators are opposed to it because they are the people today who profit when the farmers do not have this information.

Mr. Chairman, the reporting principle has been established since existing law was enacted in 1973. The only question to decide today is whether we want to make reporting work, whether we want to make it effective, and whether we want to make it meaningful. That is what the Smith of Iowa amendment does to the existing law. The practical effect is to make reporting timely and to make it complete. The problem is, as the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) said, the foreign subsidiaries of American domestic corporations do not have to report their export sales, nor do American subsidiaries of foreign grain companies, and that makes a big loophole in existing law and hence we do not have a complete picture of export sales. Either we ought to make the existing reporting requirements effective, or we should wipe them all off the books. But nobody is suggesting that, not even the Department of Agriculture which four or five years ago objected to what is now on the books.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. GRASSLEY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GRASSLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GRASSLEY. Mr. Chairman, last January, February and the early part of March we had large numbers of farmers in Washington, D.C.; and they wanted many things, but one of the concerns that was commonly heard from those farmers, and not one that they were really asking us to respond to immediately, was the general feeling that there just is not adequate information available on export sales of grain.

They referred to the Russian wheat sale. The Members remember what happened last year. The Russians knew that they were going to be 30 million metric tons short in production because of dry weather. They bought in August when our prices were at the lowest level possible. They borrowed Eurodollars at a low level to pay for those grain purchases.

Then when they finally had their sales made, they reported they were 30 million metric tons short. That, of course, impacted on the market too late, and the farmers in America who had sold at those low prices just did not know the facts timely and thus suffered financially.

Mr. Chairman, the farmers are entitled to that which this amendment makes possible more accurate information; but most specifically, we are talking about closing a loophole so as to make existing law effective. There is no better way in which to do it than through the Commodity Futures Trading Commission and through the approach suggested by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH) here today.

Mr. Chairman, I urge adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. SMITH).

The question was taken; and the Chairman pro tempore being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 14, nos 7.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 273, noes 125, not voting 34, as follows:

Messrs. MADDOX, COLEMAN, ENGLISH, BEARD of Tennessee, and GAMMAGE changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. LATTA and Mrs. BOGGS changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 19. Except as otherwise provided herein, the provisions of this Act shall become effective October 1, 1978.

Mr. FOLEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, was the Clerk reading section 19?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Yes, he was.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. LEVITAS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to find out the purpose, if this unanimous consent request is granted.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to section 1 for the purpose of considering an amendment which is at the desk.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. LEVITAS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, if the unanimous-consent request is granted and the amendment is considered and disposed of, would it then be in order for a Member to seek recognition either for the purpose of offering another amendment at the end of section 19 or to make an offer of a pro forma amendment?

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. An amendment at the end of the bill will still be in order.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I make a reservation of objection. Just as a matter of standard operating procedure a request of this type, this rarely happens. I know I have requested it on occasion. I have never been granted permission to return. I do not know why the rules ought to be set aside in this particular instance.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield. I made no objection, as bill manager, to the reconsideration of sections. In the case of the request of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) there was no objection.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Further reserving the right to object, I wonder what pearl we have uncovered late in the day that we did not know at the time this section was open for amendment.

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield further, I will be glad to inform the gentleman. The committee bill contains a provision that prohibits any official of the Commission, or any commissioner, from appearing for a period of 1 year before the Commission if that employee had a grade level of GS–16 or higher, except in matters where he is under subpena or matters relating to personal circumstances. I was informed during the course of this bill—in fact, I was not aware of it—that the Senate passed bill has a very similar provision barring any GS–15 or above from appearing before the Commission for a year.

My personal judgment is that these restrictions, so-called revolving door restrictions, are too severe and will inhibit the Commission from obtaining qualified personnel.

The amendment I would offer would bar for one year any person holding a confidential or policy position for that Commission, but would not go so far as the language of the bill and thus allow the matter to be considered in conference.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, further reserving the right to object, because of the explanation of my colleague and because I know the gentleman is not the type of colleague who in other times and places has objected to similar requests, I will forego my inclination to object.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, I might say, I took some effort to notify those who might be particularly interested in this amendment so they could be on the floor at the time of the unanimous-consent request.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY)?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. FOLEY

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, since the unanimous consent request has been granted, I now offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FOLEY: Amend section 1(10) of H.R. 10285 by adding on page 4, line 6, after the word "higher," the following: "in a position excepted from the competitive service by reason of being of a confidential or policymaking character".

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, the committee adopted a subcommittee amendment which, in effect, says that if any employee has a GS–16 rating or above, that employee cannot appear before the Commission in any representative capacity for a year following the termination of employment, except appearances in response to a subpena or of a purely personal nature.

The Senate apparently has a provision in the Senate bill which is almost exactly the same, except it is slightly more rigorous. It says GS–15 or above.

Mr. Chairman, this is a Commission that is dealing with some of the most complicated economic transactions that are carried on in our economy and in an area of economic activity which is expanding at an exponential rate, with contracts in a value of more than $1 trillion having been negotiated last year. The Commission is struggling to develop a competent, responsible, regulatory program. In that context, they need the most able assistance in terms of technical employees that they can obtain. People of ability in this field are not obtained on every street corner. Indeed, I think I would just state the obvious, that all members of our committee and Members of the House have struggled to understand some of the complications of this legislation. We know that the field is complicated. Lawyers, economists, statisticians, accountants and others are needed to carry on its highly sophisticated and important work.

The committee amendment seeks to avoid the so-called revolving door, but in the process of denying for a year the opportunity of an employee who has left the Commission, to represent another employer before the Commission, we place a special mortgage on the ability of this employee to earn a living in his field of expertise. This amendment creates the danger that the most competent and available people, particularly young lawyers and young economists, will not want to accept employment with the Commission for fear they will be too heavily encumbered later on when they are ready to make a change and go into a private career. In that case the Commission and the public will lose by being denied the services of the most able people.

For example, if we had rules that assistant attorneys general or assistant deputy prosecutors could not appear in criminal or civil cases involving a public body for a year after their service, we would have a great deal of difficulty getting the competence that we have in public law today.

What I would like to do by this amendment is to provide that if someone held a confidential or policymaking position excepted from the competitive service that person would be barred for a year; but those who are in the same pay class who do not have any such policymaking responsibility should not be excluded for a year simply because they are economists or statisticians or members of some other related profession.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADIGAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the gentleman's amendment is an excellent one. I have had an opportunity on this side to review it, and I urge that the committee support the amendment.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, it is with reluctance that I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, but I do feel it is absolutely imperative that the House understand what is at stake here.

The subcommittee has debated this matter long and hard. The subcommittee carried this provision in the bill. It was then taken to the full committee, where it was discussed thoroughly, and the full committee carried this provision.

We may be criticized because we did not go far enough. The other body went much beyond where the House went in terms of prohibiting a person who has had knowledge and has worked in a sensitive agency like this from going back to work for a company and then returning to represent that company before the agency.

The distinguished committee chairman raises the question of whether one who is so encumbered would be hired. I would point out to my colleagues that the essence of the provision that is in the bill does not provide that they cannot be hired. It simply says that they cannot return to the Commission and represent their company before their former colleagues, either in written or oral form. That is the essence, that is the context of it.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I am happy to yield to the committee chairman.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman misunderstood my concern. My concern is that someone who faces an inhibition of this kind will not join the Commission in the first instance, and that he or she will decide to go into the private firms to begin with. My concern is that they would not want to give their public service and then have to suffer for it later on.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his comment, but I thoroughly disagree with it.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that is exactly what we are getting at. It seems to me we do not want a person to go to work for the CFTC with the idea that after the service is completed, that person can then go back and represent people before the CFTC. If what we are doing by this provision is discouraging people who would do that from joining the CFTC, it seems to me that is exactly what we would like to do.

It is my feeling that we would not want to hire attorneys who are going to work for the CFTC, expecting that this experience will help them secure future clients who desire favorable treatment from the CFTC.

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, if I may proceed, let me explain how pernicious this kind of revolving door practice really is in our Government today.

Of the 11 regulatory agencies studied, 48 percent of the commissioners who left Government during the fiscal years, 1971 to 1975, went to work for the very industries they regulated or the law firms of the industries they regulated. Five of the six FTC commissioners appointed to the FTC, for example, came from companies that were regulated by the FTC, 11 out of 12 lawyers who left the General Counsel's Office at the Federal Drug Administration have gone to work for the regulated companies or the law firms of those regulated companies.

Obviously, then, those enterprises which hire a person who comes from the inner sanctum of one of these sensitive agencies do have an advantage over companies that do not hire such people.

Obviously, if you wanted to really close the door, you would say they could not take employment. We have not gone that far. We have said you cannot take employment and return to the Commission, before your former colleagues. That is all. You can take employment, you can sit down and counsel junior colleagues, and all of the rest. You simply cannot appear before the Commission to argue your case verbally.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would point out that my amendment would bar a former commissioner from appearing before the CFTC for 1 year. Those in the inner sanctum who do hold positions of a confidential or policymaking character which are excepted from the competitive service would be barred. But my amendment would not bar a lawyer who does not have a policymaking role. We do not want to discourage such a person.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. FOLEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. FITHIAN was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, let me just say—because I think this ought to be clearly stated in the record—that I could not disagree more with my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Iowa (Mr. BEDELL). I think we ought to understand that most public agencies are able to get the high quality talent they enjoy because young professionals enter Government service confident that if they do not want to continue in Government service until they retire they are free to leave. What the gentleman from Iowa proposes is that nobody should be hired unless he pledges to remain until retirement and not to go back to private enterprise or private professional life. We could not get the high caliber people we presently have serving the public as assistant attorneys general, as U.S. attorneys, deputy prosecutors in State government and in the other professions, if we had a rule that barred them for any appreciable time from using their professional talents in private enterprise. The concern that I have is that, if we adopt such a rule, we will not get the talent which is so important to the competent and effective conduct of public business.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITHIAN. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that I should have a chance to explain to the chairman of the committee, because I think the chairman of the committee has misunderstood my intention.

The bill really says that for a period of 1 year certain employees of the CFTC will not appear before the Commission or furnish written testimony directly to the Commission.

My opinion is that if people are coming to the Government with the idea that when they do they are going to serve for a while with an eye toward enhancing their chances of subsequently serving clients for whom they can get special consideration from the Government, we are better off if we hire people who do not take jobs for that reason. I do not believe for 1 minute that we should try to say, as the chairman has indicated, that we believe people should have to permanently stay with the Government when they come, or that they should not come to the Government if they do not ever expect to go back to private industry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. FOLEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. FITHIAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I think what I want the gentleman to understand is that many people go not only into Government service but also into private corporations or business in order to gain expertise that they may use in a different way. All I am saying is that there is nothing wrong with that. There is nothing wrong with people developing and becoming better professionals as a result of experience gained either in public service or private employment so long as there is no conflict of interest.

But the gentleman's amendment does not deal with conflict of interest. What the gentleman's amendment does is to bar people simply because they happened to hold a particular pay grade. That has nothing to do with whether they had responsibilities of a confidential or policymaking character. And that is the reason I am trying to amend this amendment to deal more directly with situations in which there is a potential or possibility of conflict of interest. I might note at this point that my amendment may have been construed by some to bar appearance of former CFTC employees before the Commission merely because they held supervisory positions with the CFTC. That is not the intent of the amendment. My amendment would bar for 1 year appearance before the Commission of a former CFTC employee who held a position at grade GS–16 or higher which was excepted from the competitive service by reason of being of a confidential or policymaking character. Such positions might or might not be supervisory positions. A former CFTC supervisor would not be barred unless he or she held a position of grade GS–16 or higher which was excepted from the competitive service by reason of being of a confidential or policymaking character.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. FITHIAN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BEDELL and by unanimous consent, Mr. FITHIAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Chairman, if I may engage the distinguished chairman in a colloquy in order to ask a question, does not the bill now simply provide that for only 1 year after their departure, they cannot return and represent their new employer before the Commission, in writing or orally?

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, that is what bothers me.

Mr. FITHIAN. If I may add, let me explain the understanding of the gentleman from Iowa and my understanding when we put this in the bill. It was our thought and the thought of the majority of the subcommittee and of the full committee that during 1 year after one's departure as a GS–14, a GS–15, or whatever, he might carry information with him that would be to the enormous economic advantage of his prospective employer, and that probably within that 1 year, that sensitive information would be of economic usage, and then they could continue to represent the new employer before the Commission. That is the whole thought behind the amendment as I understand it.

Mr. FOLEY. I will just tell the gentleman that if the thought is that a Commission employee is going to carry out secrets, State secrets, so to speak, and tell them to somebody outside of the Commission, then the gentleman's amendment does not have anything to do with that. It has to do with representation before the Commission at public hearings.

If they are going to deal in secrets, whether they are working for the Commission or in private business, this amendment is not directed to that problem.

Mr. FITHIAN. I would remind the chairman, a distinguished lawyer himself, that one would much better represent his client if he had that kind of information. This is exactly what this amendment is trying to do away with.

Let me make one more point. I would remind the House that late yesterday afternoon a discussion of this section of the bill occurred. I did not object to returning to this because the distinguished chairman allowed me to return to an earlier section; but I do want to remind the House that this was discussed with the gentleman from Iowa in a colloquy among him, myself, and the distinguished chairman.

I would now like to explain why we are coming back to this matter. We are coming back, in my judgment, because the Senate has passed a more strenuous measure. We have now passed or are about to pass the House version. Therefore, the conference which the chairman will preside will have to decide between those two versions, so we are now attempting here to back away from the restraints we put into our bill so that in conference with the Senate, we will not be restrained with respect to any of those matters.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the key issue here is weighing the public interest to be served by the prohibition against the revolving door versus the right of individuals to pursue their careers.

Obviously there is some interest in preventing some people from going right out of Government into either a law practice or into private enterprise in which they can use their information to work miracles for their clients.

Mr. Chairman, at what level should an employee be prevented from doing this? Is that a GS–11, a GS–12, a GS–13, a GS–14, a GS–15, or a GS–16?

The Senate has said it is GS–15. The House has said it is GS–16.

I think the point made by the chairman of the committee is that none of these figures is any criterion at all. The key issue is, At what level is policymaking, and what level influences the activities and policies of the Commission?

The chairman has chosen to say that it is the GS–16, providing there are these policymaking and confidential functions accompanying that job.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, I think the language the chairman proposes to offer is roughly comparable to the language in H.R. 1, which is the Ethics in Government Act.

Mr. Chairman, that is the second point I wish to make. There is no reason to make the CFTC entirely different from every other agency in Government. What I am saying is that we need to have some consistency in the process and some fairness in the process, too.

Mr. Chairman, let me add one more point. Let me tell the Members what the effect of all this is. The effect of the bill is to prevent anybody from going into a law firm or a business in which they will have any dealings with the Commission for 1 year. That is pretty straight—any dealings with the Commission for 1 year.

Mr. Chairman, I call this the Arnold and Porter or Covington and Burling amendment, because what this essentially means is that an individual who is a GS–16, with no policymaking role, could go to work for Arnold and Porter, and they could shove him back into some corner where he would not have to have any contact with the Commission, but he could not go back to Wichita, Kans., to Peoria, Ill., or Albuquerque, N. Mex., and immediately open up his own law practice and represent people on commodities issues, the livelihood he has dealt with all of his life.

Mr. Chairman, my point is that at some level we ought to prevent that person from even doing that.

I think the level which the chairman has proposed, which is a GS–16 with policymaking or confidential roles, is the appropriate fair level to do it, rather than just an absolute prohibition against some arbitrary figure of GS level.

I would like to mention one more point. The gentleman from Indiana talks about the Senate bill, which says in effect, "At GS–15 you are stuck. You have to abide by it." Our bill says GS–16. I am saying that in terms of the conference, if we go with GS–16, with the language the chairman submits, I think that is a much more responsible place from which to deal in the conference committee.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I want to agree entirely with the gentleman in the well and with the chairman of the committee. I think it is the most misconceived idea in the world to block talented young persons from moving into the private sector after being in the public sector. The policy discourages talented people from going into Government at all. It completely defeats the basic intent of these kinds of measures.

What they were really intended to do is to stop top policymakers who had received confidential information and who had special influence from moving from Government to business. These measures do not work toward this goal if they discourage talented young people of character and ability from going into Government in the first place.

Suppose we had this sort of rule with respect to Supreme Court law clerks; how many young men and women of top caliber from our law schools would ever serve as law clerks for Supreme Court Justices if they could not thereafter for a period of 1 year practice in an area dealt with by the Court during their tenure? This absolutely reverses the purpose that has been enunciated as the justification for such provisions.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, reading in this section, I would like to know if the gentleman could tell me what the penalty is, for instance, if I am a former employee, a GS–16 or above, and I have sent a letter to the Commission within that year—what is the penalty?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I do not see any.

Mr. VOLKMER. I do not see any at all. So, what are we really arguing about? We do not have anything here.

Mr. GLICKMAN. That is not true, because it will probably become part of the Commission's own rules and regulations.

Mr. VOLKMER. The Commission could make rules and regulations, but this does not.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

(At the request of Mr. FOLEY and by unanimous consent, Mr. GLICKMAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would advise the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. VOLKMER) that the criminal penalty section of the bill provides that there shall be a misdemeanor penalty for violating section 8(b), which is the section involved. It is a misdemeanor punishable by 1 year in jail or a $1,000 fine.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY). I am not a distinguished trial lawyer, as most of the participants in this debate are, but I feel very strongly that we are moving too far in the direction of restricting the career options of our best people in government. I object to that very strongly. This amendment will help to correct that tendency in the current bill. I therefore urge its approval.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. FOLEY).

The amendment was agreed to.

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I supported Representative BALDUS' amendment to the Commodity Exchange Act Extension legislation we are considering today, H.R. 10285.

In 1974, Congress passed the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act which gave exclusive jurisdiction to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission over commodities and related transactions and preempted any meaningful State enforcement rights. The intent was to prohibit State securities administrators from enforcing securities antifraud provisions under state law. The result has been that many fraudulent schemes in the commodities area are being pushed on the public since the Commission lacks the adequate staff and other resources needed to enforce the existing Federal law.

Since the law was passed, the CFTC has had a poor record of enforcement due to the lack of staff and other resources to monitor the industry to uncover fraudulent activity and to seek arrests and prosecutions in a timely manner. Also, in light of current budgetary constraints, it is unlikely Congress will ever give the CFTC the resources it requires to protect the public and prosecute violators of the 1974 act.

We have the remedy for the problem in our midst. The States not only already possess the ability to uncover fraudulent activity and seek prosecution through their attorneys general and securities commissioners, they have actively sought the authority to do so.

The Baldus amendment would rectify the situation by allowing States to enforce all of their antifraud laws, including securities laws, against fraud involving commodities or related transactions. The States want the authority so they can effectively protect their residents from illegal commodity option schemes. We should not expand the Federal sector when States are willing and capable of doing the job.

Under the amendment before us, States would be allowed to pass and enforce laws identical to four subsections of the CFTC Act—4b, c, d, and o—and to section 217 of the act. It requires that State civil and criminal penalties cannot exceed those provided for by the Federal law. The futures industry will be protected under the amendment by requiring that Federal example will be controlling, by giving the CFTC the right to intervene in cases, and by exempting violations on the boards of trade and on contract markets.

The amendment is supported by the National Farmers Union, the National Farmers Organization, the National Conference of State Legislatures and the North American Securities Administrators Association.

I urge that my colleagues support the Baldus amendment.

The telegram that follows was sent by John Larson, Minnesota Commissioner of Securities, in support of the amendment:

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 20, 1978.

Congressman DONALD FRASER,
Rayburn Office Building,
Washington, D.C.:

H.R. 10285, concerning the reauthorization of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, will be considered on the House floor shortly. Congressmen Baldus and Heckler will propose an amendment which would allow State officials to assist the CFTC in enforcement matters only. Such assistance is consistent with the Federal law and is vital to a legitimate commodities market. For reasons communicated previously, I urge your support of the Baldus-Heckler amendment.

JOHN R. LARSON,
Commissioner of Securities, Department of Commerce, State of Minnesota.●

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Are there further amendments to the bill? If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT) having assumed the chair, Mr. MCHUGH, Chairman pro tempore of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 10285) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, for 4 years, pursuant to House Resolution 1221, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make a point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 401, nays 6, not voting 25, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 2391) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, and for other purposes, a similar bill to H.R. 10285, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 2391

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

COMPOSITION OF THE COMMISSION; CONFLICT OF INTEREST; CONFORMING AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. Section 2(a) of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by—

(1) striking out in the first sentence of paragraph (1) (7 U.S.C. 2) "section 217 of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 19 of this Act";

(2) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (2) (7 U.S.C. 4a (a));

(3) striking out in the second sentence of paragraph (2) "a Chairman and four other Commissioners" and inserting in lieu thereof "five Commissioners";

(4) striking out in the last sentence of paragraph (2) "(A)" and "(B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(i)" and "(ii)", repectively;

(5) adding at the end of paragraph (2) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a member of the Commission as Chairman, who shall serve as Chairman at the pleasure of the President. An individual may be appointed as Chairman at the same time that person is appointed as a Commissioner. The Chairman shall be the chief administrative officer of the Commission and shall preside at hearings before the Commission. Subject to the provisions of the first sentence of this subparagraph, the President may, from time to time, designate a different Chairman, and the Commissioner previously appointed as Chairman shall complete his term as a Commissioner.";

(6) striking out in paragraph (5) (7 U.S.C. 4a(d)) ", by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,";

(7) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (7) (7 U.S.C. 4a(f));

(8) adding at the end of paragraph (7) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B) No Commissioner or employee of the Commission classified as a GS–15 or higher of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, may, for a period of one year beginning on the last day of service as such Commissioner or employee—

"(i) make any appearance before the Commission; or

"(ii) make any written or oral communication to the Commission, or any Commissioner or employee of the Commission, on behalf of any person (other than the United States) on any particular matter that is before the Commission.

The restrictions in this subparagraph shall not apply to an appearance or response under a subpena issued by the Commission, or any matter of an exclusively personal and individual nature.";

(9) striking out in the first sentence of paragraph (8) (7 U.S.C. 4a(g)) "established a separate office within the Department of Agriculture to be staffed with employees of the Commission for the purpose of maintaining" and inserting in lieu thereof "maintain";

(11) striking out in subparagraph (9)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(2)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry".

OPTIONS TRANSACTIONS; TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. Section 4c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6c) is amended by—

(1) striking out in the last sentence of subsection (a) "not have been disapproved" and inserting in lieu thereof "have been approved";

(2) striking out in subsection (b) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry"; and

(3) adding at the end thereof new subsections (c), (d), and (e) as follows:

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, it shall be unlawful for any person to offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of, any transaction subject to the provisions of subsection (b) of this section, except where both parties to such transaction are either a producer, processor, or commercial user of, or a merchant handling, the commodity involved in the transaction, or the products or by-products thereof, and offer to enter into, or enter into, or confirm the transaction solely for the purposes of their business as such, until (1) the Commission transmits to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry documentation of its ability to regulate successfully such transactions, and (2) the expiration of thirty calendar days of continuous session of Congress after the date of such transmittal. The Commission is not precluded from transmitting documentation relating to its ability to regulate such transactions regarding individual commodities, classes of commodities, or regulation of such transactions on specific boards of trade, at such time as the Commission deems appropriate. Nothing in the preceding sentence shall affect any rights or obligations arising out of any transactions subject to the provisions of this subsection entered into, or the execution of which was confirmed, prior to October 1, 1978.

"(d) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (b) and (c) of this section or section 8a(5) of this Act, a registered futures commission merchant may offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of, any transaction subject to the provisions of subsection (b) of this section if—

"(1) the grantor in the transaction is a person who—

"(A) is in the business of buying, selling, producing, or otherwise using the underlying commodity;

"(B) at all times has a net worth of at least $10,000,000 certified annually by an independent public accountant using generally accepted accounting principles;

"(C) agrees to notify such futures commission merchant if the grantor has reason to believe the grantor's net worth has fallen below $10,0000,000;

"(D) segregates daily, exclusively for the benefit of purchasers, money, exempted securities (within the meaning of section 3(a)(12) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)(12)), commercial paper, bankers' acceptances, commercial bills, or unencumbered warehouse receipts, equal to an amount by which the value of each transaction exceeds the amount received or to be received by the grantor for such transaction;

"(E) provides an identification number for each transaction; and

"(F) provides confirmation of all orders for such transactions executed, including the execution price and a transaction identification number;

"(2) the futures commission merchant has evidence that the grantor meets the requirements set forth in clause (1) of this subsection; and

"(3) the futures commission merchant—

"(A) treats and deals with an amount of money, exempted securities (within the meaning of section 3(a)(12) of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934 (15 U.S.C. 78c(a)(12)), commercial paper, bankers' acceptances, commercial bills, or unencumbered warehouse receipts, equal in value to the value received from its customers as payment of the purchase price in connection with such transactions, as security for performance of the transactions until the expiration or liquidation of those transactions;

"(B) records each transaction in its customer's name by the transaction identification number provided by the grantor; and

"(C) provides a disclosure statement to its customers, under regulations of the Commission, that discloses, among other things, all costs, including any markups or commissions involved in such transaction.

"(e) The provisions of subsections (c) and (d) of this section shall be effective for the period beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1984.".

CUSTOMERS' FUNDS AND PROPERTY

SEC. 3. Section 4d of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6d) is amended by—

(1) inserting in the first paragraph after "Provided further," the following: "That in accordance with such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe by rule, regulation, or order, such money, securities, and property of the customers of such futures commission merchant may be commingled and deposited as provided in this section with any other money, securities, and property received by such futures commission merchant and required by the Commission to be separately accounted for and treated and dealt with as belonging to the customers of such futures commission merchant: Provided further,"; and

(2) adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows:

"Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no such person, nor any trustee or receiver of such person, shall assert any rights with respect to such money, securities, and property or with respect to customer accounts held by such person, or any trustee or receiver of such person, which would prohibit, delay, or condition a transfer of such money, securities, property, or customer accounts to another futures commission merchant: Provided, That such a transfer is required under the rules, bylaws, or regulations of any contract market or clearinghouse organization of which such person is a member or under the rules and regulations of the Commission.".

(1) inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the second sentence;

(2) inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the second sentence of paragraph (a);

(3) striking out the third sentence of paragraph (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "For the purpose of securing effective enforcement of the provisions of this Act and for the purpose of any investigation or proceeding under this Act, any member of the Commission or any Administrative Law Judge or other officer designated by the Commission is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, or other records that the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry. The attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in the United States or any State at any designated place of hearing. In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction in which such investigation or proceeding is conducted, or where such person resides or transacts business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memoranda, and other records. Such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or Administrative Law Judge or other officer designated by the Commission, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question. Any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district wherein such person is an inhabitant or transacts business or wherever such person may be found.".

ISSUANCE OF A CEASE AND DESIST ORDER OR IMPOSITION OF A CIVIL MONEY PENALTY AGAINST A CONTRACT MARKET—HEARING ON THE RECORD

SEC. 11. Section 6b of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13a) is amended by inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the first sentence.

JURISDICTION OF THE STATES

SEC. 12. The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding after section 6c a new section 6d as follows:

"SEC. 6d. (1) Whenever it shall appear to the attorney general of any State, the administrator of the securities laws of any State, or such other official as a State may designate, that the interests of the residents of that State have been, are being, or may be threatened or adversely affected because any person (other than a contract market or floor broker) has engaged in, is engaging or is about to engage in, any act or practice constituting a violation of any provision of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder, the State may bring a suit in equity or an action at law on behalf of its residents to enjoin such act or practice, to enforce compliance with this Act, or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder, to obtain damages on behalf of their residents, or to obtain such further and other relief as the court may deem appropriate.

"(2) The district courts of the United States, the United States courts of any territory, and the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia, shall have jurisdiction of all suits in equity and actions at law brought under this section to enforce any liability or duty created by this Act or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder, or to obtain damages or other relief with respect thereto. Upon proper application, such courts shall also have jurisdiction to issue writs of mandamus, or orders affording like relief, commanding the defendant to comply with the provisions of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder, including the requirement that the defendant take such action as is necessary to remove the danger of violation of this Act or of any such rule, regulation, or order. Upon a proper showing, a permanent or temporary injunction or restraining order shall be granted without bond.

"(3) Immediately upon instituting any such suit or action, the State shall serve written notice thereof upon the Commission and provide the Commission with a copy of its complaint.

"(4) Any suit or action brought under this section in a district court of the United States may be brought in the district wherein the defendant is found or is an inhabitant or transacts business or wherein the act or practice occurred, is occurring, or is about to occur, and process in such cases may be served in any district in which the defendant is an inhabitant or wherever the defendant may be found.

"(5) For purposes of bringing any suit or action under this section, nothing in this Act shall prevent the attorney general, administrator of the State securities laws, or other duly authorized State officials, from exercising the powers conferred on them by the laws of such State to conduct investigations or to administer oaths or affirmations or to compel the attendance of witnesses or the production of documentary and other evidence.

"(6) For purposes of this section, the word 'State' means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, or any territory or possession of the United States.".

DISCLOSURE OF TRADERS AND THEIR POSITIONS ON BOARDS OF TRADE TO THE PUBLIC

(1) inserting in subsection (1) after "by the Commission" the following: ", which may require the applicant, and any persons associated with the applicant as the Commission may specify, to be fingerprinted and to submit, or cause to be submitted, such fingerprints to the Attorney General for identification and appropriate processing"; and

(2) striking out "and to publish" in subsection (6).

DISCLOSURE OF RESULTS OF EXCHANGE DISCIPLINARY PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 15. Section 8c(1)(B) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 12c(1)(B)) is amended by amending the last sentence to read as follows: "An exchange shall make public its findings and the reasons for the exchange action in any such proceeding, including the action taken or the penalty imposed, but shall not disclose the evidence therefor, except to the person who is suspended, expelled, or disciplined, or denied access, and to the Commission: Provided, That the restriction on disclosure of evidence in this sentence shall not apply to criminal investigations or proceedings.".

CRIMINAL PENALTIES

SEC. 16. Section 9 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13) is amended by—

(1) inserting before the period at the end of subsection (b) the following: ", or to violate the provisions of section 4, section 4b, section 4c, section 4h, section 4o(1), or section 19 of this Act, or to make any false or misleading statement of a material fact in any registration application or report filed with the Commission, or to omit to state in any application or report any material fact that is required to be stated therein";

(2) amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) Except as provided in subsections (a), (b), (d), and (e) of this section, it shall be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine of not more than $100,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both, together with the costs of prosecution, for any person to violate any provisions of section 4a, section 4d, section 4e, section 4i, section 4k, section 4m, section 4o(2), or section 8b of this Act, or fail to evidence any contract mentioned in section 4 of this Act by a record in writing as therein required.";

(3) striking out in subsection (d) "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000"; and

(4) striking out in subsection (e) "$10,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$100,000".

AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 17. Section 12(d) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 16(d)) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act such sums as may be required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, for the period beginning July 1, 1975, and ending September 30, 1976, and for each of the fiscal years during the period beginning October 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1984.".

REPARATIONS

SEC. 18. Section 14 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 18) is amended by—

(1) striking out in subsection (a) "registered" and inserting in lieu thereof "who is registered or required to be registered";

(2) striking out in subsection (b) all after "Provided," and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "That in complaints wherein the amount claimed as damages does not exceed the sum of $5,000, a hearing limited to the basic or novel issue or issues of the case shall be held, and additional proof in support of the complaint and respondent's answer may be supplied in the form of depositions or verified statements of fact."; and

(3) amending subsection (c) to read as follows:

"(c) After opportunity for hearing has been waived or a hearing is held on a complaint filed under this section, the Commission shall determine whether the respondent has violated any provision of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder."; and

(4) adding at the end thereof a new subsection (j) as follows:

"(j) Notwithstanding any other provision of this section or Act, a futures association registered under section 17 of this Act may, with the Commission's approval, adopt rules establishing a procedure whereby persons complaining of a violation of any provision of this Act or any rule, regulation, or order of the Commission thereunder by a member of the association who is registered or required to be registered under section 4d, section 4e, section 4k, or section 4m of this Act, may obtain an adjudication of such claims by the association, and the rules of the association shall govern all such claims that are or could be brought thereunder, in lieu of the procedures set forth in this section: Provided, That the decisions of the association shall be subject to subsections (f), (g), and (h) of this section to the same extent as reparations orders entered by the Commission.".

REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATION

SEC. 19. Section 17 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 21) is amended by—

(1) striking out in subsection (b)(3)(B) "(7 U.S.C. 9)";

(2) striking out in subsection (b)(10) "5,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$15,000";

(3) striking out in subsection (1)(2)(A) "title" each time that word appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Act"; and

(4) redesignating subsection (m) as subsection (n), and inserting after subsection (l) a new subsection (m) as follows:

"(m) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commission may approve rules of a futures association or of a contract market that, directly or indirectly, require persons eligible for membership in such association to become members thereof, if the Commission determines that such rules are necessary or appropriate to achieve the purposes and objects of this Act.".

LEVERAGE TRANSACTIONS; FORWARD CONTRACTS

SEC. 20. The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding at the end thereof new sections 10 and 20 as follows:

"SEC. 19. No person shall offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of, any transaction for the delivery of any commodity specifically set forth in section 2(a) of this Act prior to the enactment of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, under a standardized contract commonly known to the trade as a margin account, margin contract, leverage account, or leverage contract, or under any contract, account, arrangement, scheme, or device that the Commission determines serves the same function or functions as such a standardized contract, or is marketed or managed in substantially the same manner as such a standardized contract. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commission may prohibit or regulate any such transactions involving any other commodities under such terms and conditions as the Commission shall initially prescribe by October 1, 1979: Provided, That any such order, rule, or regulation may be made only after notice and opportunity for hearing: Provided further, That the Commission may set different terms and conditions for such transactions involving different commodities. If the Commission determines that any such transaction is a contract for future delivery within the meaning of this Act, such transaction shall be regulated in accordance with the applicable provisions of this Act.

"SEC. 20. (a) The Commission shall, for the period beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1984, monitor forward contracting for domestic agricultural commodities and maintain records of defaults on any such contracts.

"(b) The Commission shall include in its annual reports to Congress information concerning its monitoring activities under subsection (a) of this section, any defaults on forward contracts for domestic agricultural commodities during the immediately preceding fiscal year, and any observations, recommendations, or comments on forward contracts for domestic agricultural commodities and the regulation of those transactions or the need for legislation in this area as the Commission deems appropriate.

"(c) Of the sums appropriated annually to carry out this Act, not to exceed $75,000 may be used to carry out the provisions of this section.".

REPEAL OF LEVERAGE TRANSACTION PROVISION IN THE 1974 ACT

SEC. 21. Title II of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974 (7 U.S.C. 15a) is amended by repealing section 217.

USE IMMUNITY

SEC. 22. Section 6001 of part V of title 18 of the United States Code (18 U.S.C. 6001) is amended by inserting after "Civil Aeronautics Board," the following: "the Commodity Futures Trading Commission,".

NATIONAL COMMISSION ON THE EFFECTS OF FUTURES MARKETS ON FARM INCOME

SEC. 23. (a) There is hereby established a National Commission on the Effects of Futures Markets on Farm Income (hereinafter referred to as the "Commission").

Organization

(b)(1)(A) The Commission shall be composed of nine members, appointed by the President, none of whom may be employees of the Federal Government or Members of Congress. One of the members of the Commission, who, by background, experience, and education, is particularly suited to the position, shall be designated as Chairman at the time of his or her appointment.

(B) At least four of the Commission members shall be agricultural producers. The other Commission members shall represent, insofar as practicable, the interests of processors and distributors of agricultural commodities and their products, economists, commodity exchanges, national agricultural organizations, and consumers.

(C) A vice chairman shall be selected by a majority vote of the Commission.

(2) A vacancy in the Commission shall not affect its powers, except for the selection of a vice chairman. Any vacancy in the Commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original position.

Compensation of Members

(c) Each member of the Commission may receive compensation at the highest rate of pay for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code, for each day such member is engaged in the work of the Commission, and shall be reimbursed for travel expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence as authorized under section 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

Duties of the Commission

(d)(1) The Commission shall study and appraise—

(A) the relationships between the prices established on futures markets and the cash prices of the commodities;

(B) the concentration and magnitude of trading by foreign individuals, corporations, or governments on United States futures markets;

(C) the actions necessary to stimulate greater use of futures markets by American farmers, if advisable;

(D) the reasons for the differentials in the prices farmers receive for their crops and the futures prices for the same commodity;

(E) the effect of increasing the number of delivery points under a futures contract on the prices received by producers of that commodity; and

(F) the need for changes, if any, in the Commodity Exchange Act or the regulations thereunder.

(2) The Commission shall make such interim reports as it deems advisable, and it shall make a final report of its findings, conclusions, and legislative recommendations to the President and Congress by October 1, 1981, and shall cease to exist not later than ninety days thereafter.

(3) All books, papers, reports, memoranda, and all the documents collected, produced, obtained or in the custody or possession of the Commission shall, prior to the termination of the Commission, be transmitted to the Commodity Futures Trading Commission.

Powers of the Commission

(e)(1) The Commission, or any three members thereof authorized by the Commission, may conduct hearings anywhere in the United States or otherwise secure data and expressions of opinions pertinent to the study. In connection therewith, the Commissioners may—

(A) require, by special or general orders, any person to submit in writing such reports and answers to questions as the Commission may prescribe and within such reasonable period and under oath or otherwise as the Commission may determine;

(B) administer oaths;

(C) require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses in the production of all documentary evidence relating to the execution of its duties;

(D) invoke the aid of any district court of the United States in requiring compliance with such subpena or order in the case of disobedience of a subpena or order issued under this subsection;

(E) order testimony to be taken in any proceeding or investigation by deposition before any person who is designated by the Commission and who has the power to administer oaths, and in such instances to compel testimony in the production of evidence in the same manner as authorized under clauses (C) and (D) of this paragraph; and

(F) to pay witnesses the same fees and mileages as are paid in like circumstances by the courts of the United States.

(2) Any district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which an inquiry under this section is conducted may, in case of refusal to obey a subpena or order of the Commission issued under this subsection, issue an order requiring compliance therewith; and failure to obey the order of the court may be punished by the court as contempt thereof.

(3) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commission may require from the head of any executive department, agency, or independent establishment of the Federal Government available information deemed useful in the discharge of its duties, and all such departments, agencies, and establishments shall cooperate with the Commission and furnish all information requested by the Commission.

(4) The Commission may enter into contracts with Federal or State agencies, private firms, institutions, and individuals for the conduct of research or surveys, the preparation of reports, and other activities necessary to the discharge of its duties.

(5) Subject to the provisions of section 552 of title 5, United States Code, when the Commission finds that publication of any information obtained by it is in the public interest and would not give an unfair competitive advantage to any person, the Commission may publish such information in the form and manner deemed best adapted for public use, except that information that would separately disclose the business transactions of any person, trade secrets, or names of customers shall be held in confidence and shall not be disclosed by the Commission.

Administrative Arrangements

(f)(1) The Commission shall appoint and fix the compensation of an executive director and a chief economist without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates. The executive director, with the approval of the Commission, shall employ and fix the compensation of such additional personnel as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Commission, except that no individual so appointed shall be paid at a rate in excess of the rate for GS–18 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of title 5, United States Code.

(2) The executive director, with the approval of the Commission, is authorized to obtain the services of experts and consultants as provided under section 3109 of title 5, United States Code.

(3) The head of any executive department, agency, or independent establishment of the Federal Government may detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of its personnel to assist the Commission in conducting its work.

(4) Financial and administrative services (including those relating to budgeting and accounting, financial reporting, personnel, and procurement) shall be provided the Commission by the General Services Administration, for which payment shall be made in advance, or by reimbursement, from funds of the Commission in such amounts as may be agreed upon by the Chairman of the Commission and the Administrator of General Services.

Authorization of Appropriations

(g) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Commission such sums, not in excess of $1,000,000 for each year of its existence, as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

PLAN FOR USERS FEES

SEC. 24. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Commodity Futures Trading Commission is authorized to develop, and implement a plan to change and collect reasonable fees to cover the estimated cost of regulating the transactions under the jurisdiction of the Commission. However, prior to implementing such a plan, the Commission shall report its intention to do so to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry. The Commission shall include in its report the feasibility and desirability of collecting such fees. The plan described herein shall not be implemented until approved by the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 25. The provisions of this Act shall become effective October 1, 1978.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. JONES OF TENNESSEE

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES of Tennessee moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill, S. 2391, and insert in lieu thereof the text of the bill, H.R. 10285, as passed by the House, as follows:

COMPOSITION AND FUNCTIONS OF COMMISSION; CONFLICT OF INTEREST; LIAISON WITH OTHER AGENCIES; CONFORMING AND TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SECTION 1. Section 2(a) of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by—

(1) striking out "and (vi)" in paragraph (1) (7 U.S.C. 2) in the definition of the term "commodity trading advisor" and inserting in lieu thereof "(vi) dealers, processors, brokers, and sellers of cash commodities and products thereof, (vii) nonprofit, voluntary membership, general farm organizations which provide advice on the sale and purchase of cash commodities, and (viii)";

(2) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (2) (7 U.S.C. 4a (a));

(5) adding at the end of paragraph (2) a new subparagraph as follows:

"(B) The President shall appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a member of the Commission as Chairman who shall serve at the pleasure of the President. An individual may be appointed as Chairman at the same time that person is appointed as a Commissioner. The Chairman shall be the chief administrative officer of the Commission and shall preside at hearings before the Commission. The President may, in his discretion, at any time appoint a different Chairman, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the Commissioner previously appointed as Chairman shall complete his term as a Commissioner.";

(6) striking out in paragraph (5) (7 U.S.C. 4a(d)) ", by and with the advice and consent of the Senate,";

(7) inserting in subparagraph (6)(A) (7 U.S.C. 4a(e)(1)) after "use and expenditures of funds" the words "according to budget categories, plans, programs, and priorities established and approved by the Commission,";

(8) striking out in subparagraph (6)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(e)(2)) "of the Commission" and inserting in lieu thereof ", plans, priorities, and budgets approved by the Commission";

(9) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (7) (7 U.S.C. 4a (f));

(10) adding at the end of paragraph (7) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B) No Commissioner or employee of the Commission classified as a GS–16 or higher in a position excepted from the competitive service by reason of being of a confidential or policymaking character shall, for a period of one year beginning on the last day of service as such Commissioner or employee (i) make any appearance before, or (ii) make any written or oral communication to the Commission or any Commissioner or employee of the Commission, on behalf of any person (other than the United States) on any particular matter that is before the Commission if such last day of service is more than four months after the date of enactment of this subparagraph: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply to an appearance or response to a subpena or any matter of an exclusively personal and individual nature.";

(11) inserting "(A)" immediately after the designation of paragraph (8) (7 U.S.C. 4a(g));

(12) striking out in the first sentence of paragraph (8) "establish a separate office within the Department of Agriculture to be staffed with employees of the Commission for the purpose of maintaining" and inserting in lieu thereof "maintan";

(13) adding at the end of paragraph (8) a new subparagraph (B) as follows:

"(B)(i) The Commission shall maintain communications with the United States Department of the Treasury, the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Securities and Exchange Commission for the purpose of keeping such agencies fully informed of Commission activities that relate to the responsibilities of those agencies, for the purpose of seeking the views of those agencies on such activities, and for considering the relationships between the volume and nature of investment and trading in futures contracts under the jurisdiction of the Commission and in securities and/or financial instruments under the jurisdiction of such agencies.

"(ii) When a board of trade applies for designation as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security issued or guaranteed by the United States or any agency thereof, the Commission shall promptly deliver a copy of such application to the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System. The Commission may not designate such board of trade as a contract market based on such application until forty-five days from the date the Commission delivers the application to such agencies or until such time as the Commission receives comments from each of such agencies on the application, whichever period is shorter. Any comments received by the Commission from such agencies will be included as part of the public record of the Commission's designation proceeding. In approving, refusing, suspending, or revoking the designation of a board of trade as a contract market involving transactions for future delivery of any security referred to in this section or in considering possible emergency action under section 8a(9) of the Act with respect to such transactions, the Commission shall take into consideration all comments it receives from the Department of the Treasury and the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and shall consider the impact that designation, suspension, revocation, or emergency action might have on the debt financing requirements of the United States Government and the continued efficiency and integrity of the underlying market for government securities.";

(14) striking out in subparagraph (9)(A) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(1)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry"; and

(15) striking out in subparagraph (9)(B) (7 U.S.C. 4a(h)(2)) "Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry" and inserting in lieu thereof "Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry".

OPTIONS TRANSACTIONS; TECHNICAL AMENDMENTS

SEC. 2. Section 4c of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 6c) is amended by—

(1) striking out in the last sentence of subsection (a) "not have been disapproved" and inserting in lieu thereof "have been approved";

(2) amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b)(1) It shall be unlawful for any person subsequent to the date of the enactment of this subsection to offer to enter into, enter into, or confirm the execution of any commodity option transactions involving any commodity regulated under this Act but not specifically set forth in section 2(a) of this Act prior to the enactment of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, unles expressly permitted under rules or regulations that the Commission, in its discretion, may prescribe subsequent to the date of enactment of this subsection after notice and opportunity for a hearing: Provided, That this subsection shall not apply to any commodity option transaction expressly permitted under rules or regulations prescribed by the Commission, before or after the date of enactment of this subsection, to be offered to be entered into, entered into, or confirmed, to or by, a producer, processor, or commercial user of, or a merchant handling, the commodity involved in the transaction, or the products or by-products thereof: Provided further, That if the Commission allows commodity option transactions the Commission may set different terms and conditions for different markets.

"(2) As used in this subsection, 'commodity option transaction' means any transaction or agreement which is, is held out to be, is of the character of, or is commonly known to the trade as an 'option', 'privilege', 'indemnity', 'bid', 'offer', 'put', 'call', 'advance guaranty', or 'decline guaranty'.

"(3) Nothing contained in this subsection shall affect any rights and obligations arising under any commodity option transaction entered into before the effective date of this subsection.

"(4) Notwithstanding the foregoing provisions of this subsection, the Commission, in its sole discretion and subject to such rules and regulations as it may prescribe without regard to the requirements of the Administrative Procedure Act or any other provision of this Act, may permit for a period not to exceed nine months any person domiciled in the United States who on May 1, 1978, was in the business of granting an option on a physical commodity and was in the business of buying, selling, producing, or otherwise utilizing that commodity to continue to grant or issue options on that commodity. Such rules and regulations, among other things, may restrict the distribution of such options to, and the offer and sale of such options by, such futures commission merchants as may be specified by the Commission. Any permission granted pursuant to this subsection may be terminated only after a hearing including a finding that the continuation of such permission is contrary to the public interest: Provided, That pending the completion of such termination proceedings the Commission may suspend the right to offer and sell options of any person whose activities in the Commission's judgment present a substantial risk to the public interest.

"(5) No rule or regulation issued or promulgated pursuant to this subsection (b) shall become effective until (i) the Commission transmits to the House Committee on Agriculture and the Senate Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry a copy of such rule or regulation, and (ii) the expiration of ten calendar days of continuous session of Congress after the date of such transmittal without either House of Congress adopting a resolution disapproving such rule or regulation.".

CUSTOMER FUNDS AND PROPERTY

SEC. 3. Section 4d(2) of the Commodity Exchange Act (17 U.S.C. 6d(2)) is amended by inserting after "Provided further," in the first paragraph the following: "That in accordance with such terms and conditions as the Commission may prescribe by rule, regulation, or order, such money, securities, and property of the customers of such futures commission merchant may be commingled and deposited as provided in this section with any other money, securities, and property received by such futures commission merchant and required by the Commission to be separately accounted for and treated and dealt with as belonging to the customers of such futures commission merchant: And provided further,".

(2) inserting "on the record" after "hearing" in the second sentence of subsection (a);

(3) striking out the third sentence of subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new sentences: "For the purpose of securing effective enforcement of the provisions of this Act, and for the purpose of any investigation or proceeding under this Act, any member of the Commission or any Administrative Law Judge or other officer designated by the Commission is empowered to administer oaths and affirmations, subpena witnesses, compel their attendance, take evidence, and require the production of any books, papers, correspondence, memorandums, or other records which the Commission deems relevant or material to the inquiry.

Such attendance of witnesses and the production of any such records may be required from any place in the United States at any designated place of hearing. In case of contumacy by, or refusal to obey a subpena issued to, any person, the Commission may invoke the aid of any court of the United States within the jurisdiction in which such investigation or proceeding is carried on, or where such person resides or carries on business, in requiring the attendance and testimony of witnesses and the production of books, papers, correspondence, memorandums, and other records. Such court may issue an order requiring such person to appear before the Commission or member or Administrative Law Judge or other officers designated by the Commission, there to produce records, if so ordered, or to give testimony touching the matter under investigation or in question and any failure to obey such order of the court may be punished by such court as a contempt thereof. All process in any such case may be served in the judicial district wherein such person is an inhabitant or conducts business or wherever such person may be found.".

HEARING ON THE RECORD FOR CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS AND IMPOSITION OF CIVIL PENALTY

SEC. 12. Section 6b of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 13a) is amended by inserting in the first sentence "on the record" after "hearing".

JURISDICTION OF THE STATES

SEC. 13. The Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding after section 6c a new section as follows:

"SEC. 6d. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, in order to promote effective enforcement, curtail or prevent fraud, protect the public interest, and effectively utilize the resources available to State agencies, any State agency or official may—

"(1) investigate or prosecute in a civil action violations of this Act, of section 217 of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission Act of 1974, or of the rules or regulations thereunder in any district court of the United States which would have jurisdiction thereof, if such action had been brought by the Commission, and that court shall have jurisdiction to entertain any such action brought under this section, and the Commission shall be entitled as of right to intervene in any such action as a party thereto: Provided, however, That a State agency or official may not investigate or prosecute any violation of the Acts or the rules and regulations thereunder committed or alleged to be committed by a designated contract market or a board of trade licensed by the Commission (or committed or alleged to be committed by the organization clearing transactions thereon); and

"(2) investigate and prosecute violations of the criminal statutes of such State.".

LIMITATION ON DISCLOSURE TO THE PUBLIC OF NAMES AND POSITIONS OF TRADERS ON BOARDS OF TRADE

SEC. 14. Section 8 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 12–1) is amended by—

(1) inserting in the first sentence "but subject to the limitations set forth below," after "discretion";

(2) striking out in the first sentence ", except data and information which would separately disclose the business transactions of any person and trade secrets or names of customers" and inserting in lieu thereof ": Provided, however, That, notwithstanding the foregoing, the Commission shall not disclose publicly or publish any data or information which would separately disclose the market positions, business transactions, trade secrets, or names of customers of any person unless such data or information has been previously disclosed publicly in an administrative proceeding pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, a judicial or congressional proceeding";

(3) inserting in the first sentence ", except that any facts that are subject to the restrictions on public disclosure hereinabove set forth may be included in such report only after such facts have otherwise been publicly disclosed in an administrative proceeding pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, a judicial or Congressional proceeding" after ": Provided further, That the Commission in any report may include facts as to any actual transaction";

(4) striking out in the second paragraph "from time to time" and inserting in lieu thereof "but only after such information has otherwise been publicly disclosed in an administrative proceeding pursuant to the Commodity Exchange Act, as amended, a judicial or congressional proceeding,";

SEC. 18. Section 12(d) of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 16(d)) is amended to read as follows:

"(d) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act such sums as may be required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1975, for the period beginning July 1, 1975, and ending September 30, 1976, and for each of the fiscal years beginning October 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1981, and not in excess of such sums as may, after the date of enactment of this subsection, be authorized by law for any subsequent fiscal year.".

REPARATIONS PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 19. Section 14 of the Commodity Exchange Act (7 U.S.C. 18) is amended by—

(1) striking out "registered" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "who is registered or should be registered";

(2) striking out "$2,500" in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000"; and

(3) striking out "$2,500" in subsection (c) wherever it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "$5,000".

REGISTERED FUTURES ASSOCIATIONS

SEC. 20. Section 17 of the Commodity Exchange Act is amended by adding a new subsection (n) as follows:

"(n) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, the Commission may approve rules of futures associations that, directly or indirectly, require persons eligible for membership in such associations to become members of at least one such association, upon a determination by the Commission that such rules are necessary or appropriate to achieve the purposes and objectives of this Act.".

SEC. 21. Any person who sells any commodity (as defined in section 2 of this Act) for export shall, within forty-eight hours after such sale, inform the Commission of (1) the date of such sale, (2) the name and full identity of the commodity sold, (3) the quantity of the commodity sold, (4) the name of the buyer and the country or countries to which the commodity is to be shipped, (5) the sale price, and (6) such other information as the Commission may by regulation require. The Commission shall by regulation prescribe the manner in which the above information shall be transmitted. On the first working day following its receipt, such information shall be made available by public announcement and shall remain available for public inspection for a reasonable time thereafter. The Commission shall prescribe regulations to assure that such information shall be disclosed simultaneously to the public and to protect against any person or firm gaining from premature disclosure.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 22. Except as otherwise provided herein, the provisions of this Act shall become effective October 1, 1978.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H.R. 10285, was laid on the table.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON S. 2391 COMMODITY EXCHANGE ACT

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House insist on its amendment to the Senate bill (S. 2391) to extend the Commodity Exchange Act, and for other purposes, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and, without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. FOLEY, JONES of Tennessee, POAGE, DE LA GARZA, RICHMOND, BALDUS, BEDELL, ENGLISH, PANETTA, HARKIN, FITHIAN, GLICKMAN, BROWN of California, WAMPLER, MADIGAN, JEFFORDS, KELLY, COLEMAN, and MARLENEE.

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 12514, INTERNATIONAL SECURITY ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1978

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95–1392) on the resolution (H. Res. 1286) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12514) to amend the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 and the Arms Export Control Act to authorize international security assistance programs for fiscal year 1979 and for other purposes, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT OF RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 9486, AUTHORIZING UNITED STATES CONTRIBUTION TO INTERNATIONAL TIN BUFFER STOCK

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95–1393) on the resolution (H. Res. 1287) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 9486) to authorize a contribution by the United States to the tin buffer stock established under the Fifth International Tin Agreement, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION ON H.R. 11711, TRADE ACT OF 1974

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95–1394) on the resolution (H. Res. 1288) providing for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 11711) to improve the operation of the adjustment assistance programs for workers and firms under the Trade Act of 1974, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

DEEP SEABED HARD MINERALS ACT

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 3350) to promote the orderly development of hard mineral resources in the deep seabed, pending adoption of an international regime relating thereto.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill, H.R. 3350, with Mr. SIMON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on Monday, July 24, 1978, all time for general debate on the bill had expired.

Pursuant to the rule, it shall be in order to consider by titles the text of H.R. 12988, if offered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute, as an original bill for the purpose of amendment. No amendment to title IV of said substitute which would change title IV, shall be in order except amendments recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means and an amendment printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 5, 1978, by Representative STARK of California, which amendments shall not be subject to amendment, but it shall be in order to debate said amendments and title IV by the offering of pro forma amendments.

The Clerk will now read section 1 of the original bill H.R. 3350, and the Chair will then recognize the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) to offer the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Deep Seabed Hard Mineral Resources Act".

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. BREAUX

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute, the text of which is contained in the bill, H.R. 12988, a copy of which is at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. BREAUX: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Section 1. Short title.

Titles I, II, and III of this Act may be cited as the "Deep Seabed Hard Mineral Resources Act".

Sec. 2. Findings and purposes.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds that—

(1) the United States requirements for hard minerals to satisfy national industrial needs, will continue to expand and that the demand for such minerals will eventually exceed the available domestic sources of supply;

(2) in the case of certain hard minerals, the United States is dependent upon foreign sources of supply and that the acquisition of such minerals from foreign sources is a significant factor in the national balance-of-payments position;

(3) the present and future national interest of the United States requires the availability of hard mineral resources which are independent of the export policies of foreign nations;

(4) there is an alternate source of supply of certain hard minerals, including nickel, copper, cobalt, and manganese, which are significant in relation to national needs contained in the nodules existing in great abundance on the deep seabed;

(5) major deposits of such nodules have been proven to exist in areas of the deep seabed which are seaward of the limits of national resource jurisdiction recognized by international law;

(6) various mining companies are engaged in developing the technology necessary for the commercial recovery and processing of such nodules;

(7) given the necessary investment climate, United States mining companies are prepared to undertake programs for the commercial recovery and processing of hard minerals from the deep seabed;

(8) it is in the national interest to establish a program to encourage the exploration and commercial recovery activities of United States citizens and that such activities be regulated in a manner to protect the quality of the environment;

(9) the United States supported (by affirmative vote in the General Assembly) United Nations General Assembly Resolution 2749 (XXV) declaring the principle that the mineral resources of the deep seabed are the common heritage of mankind but recognized, however, that this principle would be legally defined under the terms of a comprehensive international Law of the Sea Treaty to be agreed upon in the future;

(10) since the parties currently attempting to negotiate a comprehensive international Law of the Sea Treaty have been unable to come to a final agreement, and since their failure to reach agreement may slow the development of the technology necessary to develop the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed, interim domestic legislation is required to encourage the development of such technology to continue; and

(11) deep seabed mining is a freedom of the high seas, subject to a duty of reasonable regard to the interests of other States in their exercise of that and other freedoms recognized by the general principles of international law.

(b) PURPOSES.—The Congress declares that the purposes of this Act are—

(1) to establish an interim program to encourage and regulate the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed by United States citizens, pending the entering into force with respect to the United States of a superseding international agreement relating to such activities;

(2) to insure that the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed are conducted in a manner which will encourage the orderly and efficient development of such resources, will protect the environment, and will promote the safety of life and property at sea;

(3) to encourage the successful negotiation of a comprehensive international Law of the Sea Treaty which will give legal definition to the principle that the mineral resources of the deep seabed are the common heritage of mankind; and, pending the entering into force of such a Treaty, to provide for the establishment of a special fund the proceeds of which shall be used for sharing with the international community pursuant to such Treaty; and

(4) to allow the continued development of technology necessary to develop the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed as soon as possible.

Sec. 3. Definitions.

For purposes of titles I, II, and III—

(1) The term "commercial recovery" means any activity engaged in at sea to recover any hard mineral resource at a substantial rate (without regard to profit or loss) for the primary purpose of marketing or commercially using such resource; and, if such recovered resource will be processed at sea, such processing.

(2) The term "Continental Shelf" means—

(A) the seabed and subsoil of the submarine areas adjacent to the coast but outside the area of the territorial sea, to a depth of two hundred meters or, beyond that limit, to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of such areas; and

(B) the seabed and subsoil of similar submarine areas adjacent to the coasts of islands.

(3) The term "deep seabed" means the seabed, and the subsoil thereof to a depth of ten meters, lying seaward of, and outside—

(A) the Continental Shelf of any nation; and

(B) any area of national resource jurisdiction of any foreign nation, if such area extends beyond the Continental Shelf of such nation and such jurisdiction is recognized by the United States.

(4) The term "development" means exploration and commercial recovery.

(5) The term "exploration" means—

(A) any outside observation and evaluation activity which has, as its objective, the establishment and documentation of—

(i) the nature, shape, concentration, and tenor of a hard mineral resource, and

(ii) the environmental, technical, and other appropriate factors which must be taken into account to achieve commercial recovery; and

(B) the taking from the deep seabed of such quantities of any hard mineral resource as are necessary for the design, fabrication, installation, and testing of equipment which is intended to be used in the commercial recovery of such resource.

(6) The term "hard mineral resource" means any deposit or accretion on, or just below, the surface of the deep seabed of nodules which contain one or more minerals, at least one of which is manganese, nickel, cobalt, or copper.

(7) The term "international agreement" means any Convention, which may be adopted by a United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, relating to (among other matters), and establishing an international regime for the regulation of, the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed.

(8) The term "licensee" means any United States citizen who is issued a license under title I to engage in exploration.

(9) The term "permittee" means any licensee who is issued a permit under title I to engage in commercial recovery.

(10) The term "reciprocating state" means any foreign nation designated as such by the President under section 107.

(11) The term "United States" means the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, Guam, and any other Commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States.

(12) The term "United States citizen" means—

(A) any individual who is a citizen of the United States; and

(B) any corporation, partnership, association, or other entity organized or existing under the laws of any of the United States.

TITLE I—REGULATION OF EXPLORATION AND COMMERCIAL RECOVERY BY UNITED STATES CITIZENS

Sec. 101. Disclaimer of extraterritorial sovereignty.

By the enactment of this Act, the United States—

(1) exercise its jurisdiction to regulate United States citizens in the carrying out of development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed; but

(2) does not thereby assert sovereignty or sovereign or exclusive rights over, or the ownership of, any area of the deep seabed.

Sec. 102. Prohibited activities by United States citizens.

(a) IN GENERAL.—No United States citizen may engage, directly or indirectly, in exploration or commercial recovery unless authorized to do so—

(1) under a license for exploration or permit for commercial recovery issued under this title;

(2) under a license, permit, or equivalent authorization issued by a reciprocating state; or

(3) pursuant to an international agreement which is in force with respect to the United States.

(b) EXISTING EXPLORATION.—Subsection (a)(1) shall not be deemed to prohibit any United States citizen who is engaged in exploration before the date of the enactment of this Act from continuing to engage in such exploration—

(1) if such citizen applies for a license under section 103(d) with respect to such exploration within such reasonable period of time, after the date on which initial regulations to carry out section 103(d) are issued, as the Secretary shall prescribe; and

(2) until such license is issued to such citizen or a final administrative or judicial determination is made affirming the denial of the issuance of such license.

The timely filing of any application for a license under paragraph (1) shall entitle the applicant to priority of right for the issuance of such license under section 103(e). In any case in which more than one application referred to in paragraph (1) is filed with respect to all or part of the same area of the deep seabed, the Secretary shall, in taking action on such applications, apply principles of equity based on the date on which the applicants commenced exploration activities and the amount of funds expended with respect to such activities by each applicant regarding the area concerned.

(c) INTERFERENCE.—No United States citizen may take any action to interfere physically with any activity authorized by a license or permit issued under this title or by a license, permit, or equivalent authorization, which is issued by a reciprocating state for the exploration or commercial recovery of hard mineral resources.

(d) EXCEPTIONS.—The prohibitions of subsection (a) shall not apply with respect to any of the following activities carried out by any United States citizen:

(1) Scientific research with respect to hard mineral resources.

(2) The taking of any geophysical or geochemical measurements, or random bottom samplings, of the deep seabed; if such taking does not significantly alter the surface or subsurface of the deep seabed.

(3) The design, construction, or testing of equipment and facilities which will or may be used for exploration or commercial recovery, if such design, construction, or testing is conducted on shore.

(4) The furnishing of machinery, products, supplies, services, or materials in support of any exploration or commercial recovery operation engaged in by a licensee or permittee.

Sec. 103. Licenses for exploration and permits for commercial recovery.

(a) AUTHORITY TO ISSUE.—Subject to the provisions of this title, the Secretary shall issue to applicants who are eligible therefor licenses for exploration and permits for commercial recovery.

(b) NATURE OF LICENSES AND PERMITS.—(1) A license or permit issued under this title shall authorize the holder thereof to engage in exploration or commercial recovery, as the case may be, consistent with the provisions of titles I, II, and III, the regulations issued by the Secretary to carry out such provisions, and the specific terms, conditions, and restrictions applied with respect to the license or permit by the Secretary.

(2) Any license for exploration or permit for commercial recovery issued under this title shall be exclusive with respect to the holder thereof as against any other United States citizen or any citizen, national, or governmental agency of, or any legal entity organized or existing under the laws of, any reciprocating state.

(c) STATUTORY RESTRICTIONS AND CONDITIONS.—(1) The Secretary may not issue—

(A) any license for exploration or any permit for commercial recovery after the date on which an international agreement enters into force with respect to the United States, except to the extent that issuance of such license or permit is not inconsistent with such agreement;

(B) any permit authorizing commercial recovery within any area of the deep seabed to other than the licensee for such area;

(C) any permit which authorizes commercial recovery before January 1, 1980;

(D) any license for exploration of, or any permit for commercial recovery within, any area of the deep seabed if, within the 3-year period before the date of application of such license or permit, the applicant therefor surrendered or relinquished such area under a previous license or permit isssued to him or such area was covered under a license or permit previously issued to such applicant and such license or permit was revoked under section 104; or

(E) any license for exploration of, or permit for commercial recovery within, any area of the deep seabed which is covered by any pending application to which priority of right for issuance applies under section 103 (e); any existing license or permit; or any license, permit, or equivalent authorization issued by a reciprocating state.

(2) No permittee may use any vessel for the commercial recovery of hard mineral resources or for the processing of such resources at sea unless the vessel is documented under the laws of the United States or the laws of a reciprocating state.

(3) The Secretary shall issue regulations with respect to the locations in which any permittee may process hard mineral resources recovered by such permittee pursuant to a permit for commercial recovery. In issuing such regulations the Secretary shall take into account—

(A) the multinational nature of deep seabed mining operations;

(B) in consultation with the Secretary of State, the foreign policy interests of the United States;

(C) the necessity of maximizing employment opportunities in the United States; and

(D) the national interest in maintaining an adequate domestic supply of such resources.

(d) APPLICATIONS.—(1) Any United States citizen may apply to the Secretary for a license for exploration.

(2) Any licensee may apply to the Secretary for a permit for commercial recovery.

(3) Applications for such licenses and permits shall be made in such form and manner as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe, and shall contain such relevant financial, technical, environmental, and other information, as the Secretary may by regulation require as being necessary or appropriate to make determinations under subsection (f) with respect to applications.

(e) PRIORITY OF RIGHT FOR ISSUANCE.—Subject to section 102(b), priority of right for the issuance of licenses to applicants shall be established on the basis of the chronological order in which license applications, which are in substantial compliance with the requirements prescribed under subsection (d)(3), are filed with the Secretary. Priority of right shall not be lost in the case of any application filed which is not in full compliance with such requirements if the applicant thereafter brings the application into conformity with such requirements within such reasonable period of time as the Secretary shall provide.

(f) ACTION ON APPLICATIONS.—(1) Before the Secretary may approve any application for a license or permit, the Secretary must determine that—

(A) the applicant is financially responsible to meet all obligations which may be required to engage in exploration or commercial recovery, as the case may be, proposed in the application;

(B) the applicant has the technological capability to engage in such exploration or commercial recovery; and

(C) the exploration or commercial recovery activity proposed in the application will not—

(i) unreasonably interfere with the interests of other States in their exercise of the freedoms of the high seas, as recognized under the general principles of international law,

(ii) conflict with an international obligation of the United States, established by any treaty or convention in force with respect to the United States, and

(iii) pose an unreasonable threat to the quality of the environment, and in making such determination the Secretary shall take into account any applicable programmatic environmental impact statement prepared under section 105(a).

(2) Upon making the determinations required under paragraph (1) with respect to any applicant and the exploration or commercial recovery proposed by such applicant, and payment by the applicant of the fee required under subsection (h), the Secretary shall approve the application.

(g) TERMS, CONDITIONS, AND RESTRICTIONS.—(1) After approving any application for a license or permit under subsection (f) and after publication of the final environmental impact statement prepared on the license or permit application pursuant to section 105(b), the Secretary shall establish terms, conditions, and restrictions that are consistent with the criteria set forth in section 106(b) with respect to the carrying out of the exploration or commercial recovery proposed in the application for the license or permit.

(2) The Secretary shall provide to each applicant a written statement of the terms, conditions, and restrictions established by the Secretary under paragraph (1). The applicant shall be deemed to have accepted such terms, conditions, and restrictions if the applicant does not notify the Secretary, before the close of the 60-day period beginning on the day on which the written statement is provided to the applicant, of each term, condition, or restriction with respect to which the applicant takes exception. If the Secretary and the applicant are thereafter unable to resolve their differences with respect to any term, condition, or restriction to which the applicant has taken exception, the applicant is entitled to an adjudication on the record after opportunity for agency hearing with respect to such terms, condition, or restriction. Any determination made by the Secretary pursuant to such adjudication is subject to judicial review as provided for in chapter 7 of title 5, United States Code.

(3) Upon acceptance by the applicant for any license or permit of the terms, conditions, and restrictions established by the Secretary under paragraph (1) (which terms, conditions, and restrictions shall be incorporated as a part of the license or permit), the Secretary shall, subject to the subsection (j), issue the license or permit to the applicant.

(h) FEES.—(1) No application for a license or permit may be approved under this section unless the applicant pays to the Secretary an administrative fee. The amount of the administrative fee imposed by the Secretary on any applicant shall, to the extent ascertainable, reflect the reasonable administrative costs incurred by the Secretary in processing the application.

(i) MODIFICATION OF TERMS, CONDITIONS, AND RESTRICTIONS.—(1) After the issuance of any license or permit, the Secretary may modify any term, condition, or restriction in such license or permit if the Secretary finds that such modification is necessary to—

(A) avoid unreasonable interference with the interests of other States in their exercise of the freedoms of the high seas, as recognized under the general principles of international law;

(B) avoid a conflict with any international obligation of the United States, established by any treaty or convention in force with respect to the United States; or

(C) protect the quality of the environment;

if relevant data and other information (including, but not limited to, data resulting from the carrying out of exploration or commercial recovery operations under the license or permit) indicate that modification is required. Any modification under this subsection must be consistent with the criteria set forth in section 106(b) (8) or (9), as the case may be.

(2) No modification may be made under paragraph (1)(C) if the Secretary determines, on the basis of substantial evidence, that the national interest in obtaining hard mineral resources from the area which is covered by the license or permit and which is the subject of the proposed modification outweighs the potential injury to the quality of the environment intended to be remedied by the modification. In determining whether a license or permit shall be modified under paragraph (1)(C), the Secretary shall also consider whether the proposed modification would result in significant economic loss to the licensee or permittee which would substantially outweigh the potential injury to the quality of the environment intended to be remedied by the modification.

(3) The procedures set forth in subsection (g)(2) shall apply with respect to any modification under this subsection in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if such modification were an initial term, condition, or restriction proposed by the Secretary.

(4) The Secretary may suspend any license or permit issued under this section if such suspension is necessary—

(A) to avoid a conflict with an international obligation of the United States, established by any treaty or convention in force with respect to the United States; or

(B) in the interests of national security as determined by the President.

The procedures set forth in section 104 shall apply with respect to any suspension under this subparagraph.

(j) ANTITRUST REVIEW.—(1) Whenever any application for the issuance of a license or permit is received, the Secretary shall transmit promptly a complete copy of such application to the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission.

(2) The Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission shall conduct such antitrust reviews of such application as they deem appropriate and shall, if they deem appropriate, advise the Secretary of the likely effects of such issuance on competition.

(3) The Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission may make any recommendation they deem advisable to avoid any action upon such application by the Secretary which would create or maintain a situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws. Such recommendations may include without limitation the denial of the application or its issuance upon such terms and conditions as may be appropriate.

(4) Any advice or recommendation submitted by the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission pursuant to this subsection shall be submitted within 90 days of their receipt of the application. The Secretary shall not issue the license or permit during this 90-day period, except upon written confirmation by the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission that neither intends to submit any further advice or recommendation on the application.

(5) If the Secretary decides to approve any application of which denial has been recommended by the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission or to approve any application without imposing those terms and conditions recommended by the Attorney General or the Federal Trade Commission as being appropriate to prevent any situation inconsistent with the antitrust laws, the Secretary shall, prior to or upon the issuance of the license or permit, notify the Attorney General and the Federal Trade Commission of the reasons for such decision.

(6) The issuance of a license or permit shall not be admissible in any way as a defense to any civil or criminal action for violation of the antitrust laws of the United States, nor shall it in any way modify or abridge any private right of action under such laws.

(7) An antitrust review authorized by this subsection shall be deemed to be an "antitrust investigation" within the meaning of the Antitrust Civil Process Act (15 U.S.C. 1311 et seq.).

(8) As used in this subsection, the term "antitrust law" means the Sherman Act, the Clayton Act, the Federal Trade Commission Act, the Wilson Tariff Act, or the Robinson-Patman Act (15 U.S.C. 13, 13a, 13b, and 21a).

Sec. 104. Denial of approval of applications and suspension and revocation of licenses and permits.

(a) DENIAL, SUSPENSION, AND REVOCATION.—(1) The Secretary may—

(A) deny approval of any application made for a license or permit if the Secretary finds that the applicant, or the activities proposed to be undertaken by the applicant, do no meet the requirements set forth in section 103(f)(1); and

(B) in addition to, or in lieu of, the imposition of any civil penalty under section 302(a), or in addition to the imposition of any fine under section 303, suspend or revoke any license or permit issued under this section if the licensee or permittee, as the case may be, substantially fails to comply with any provision of title, I, II, or III, any regulation issued thereunder, or any term, condition, or restriction of the license or permit.

(2) No action may be taken by the Secretary to deny approval of any application or to suspend or revoke any license or permit unless—

(A) the Secretary gives the applicant, licensee, or permittee, as the case may be, written notice of his intention to deny, suspend, or revoke and the reason therefor, and

(B) if the reason for the proposed denial, suspension, or revocation is a deficiency which the applicant, licensee, or permittee can correct, the Secretary gives the applicant, licensee, or permittee a reasonable time, but not more than 180 days from the date of the notice (or such longer period as the Secretary may establish for good cause shown), to correct such deficiency.

(3) The Secretary shall deny approval of any application and suspend or revoke any license or permit—

(A) on the 30th day after the date of the notice given to the applicant, licensee, or permittee under paragraph (2)(A) unless before such day the applicant, licensee, or permittee requests a review of the proposed denial, suspension, or revocation; or

(B) on the last day of the period established under paragraph (2)(B) in which the applicant, licensee, or permittee must correct a deficiency, if such correction has not been made before such day.

(b) ADMINISTRATION REVIEW OF DENIAL OR PROPOSED SUSPENSION OR REVOCATION.—Any applicant, licensee, permittee, as the case may be, who makes a timely request under subsection (a) for review of a denial or a proposed suspension or revocation of a license or permit, is entitled to an adjudication on the record after opportunity for an agency hearing with respect to such denial or proposed suspension or revocation.

(c) EFFECT ON OPERATIONS.—The issuance of any notice of proposed suspension or revocation shall not affect the continuation of exploration or commercial recovery operations by the licensee or permittee under the license or permit unless the Secretary determines, and issues an emergency order declaring, that such operations, if continued, will cause an unreasonable threat to the quality of the environment by creating significant injury to that environment, or would be contrary to the national interest.

(d) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Any determination of the Secretary under subsection (b) to deny approval of any application or to suspend or revoke any license or permit is subject to judicial review as provided for under chapter 7 of title 5 of the United States Code.

Sec. 105. Environmental impact assessments.

(a) PROGRAMMATIC ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACT STATEMENTS.—(1) The Secretary, in consultation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and with the assistance of other appropriate Federal agencies, shall with respect to the area of the oceans in which any United States citizen will likely undertake development under the authority of this title—

(A) prepare and publish a draft programmatic environmental impact statement which assesses the environmental impact of development on such area;

(B) afford all interested parties a reasonable time after such date of publication to submit comments to the Secretary on such draft statement; and

(C) thereafter prepare (giving full consideration to all comments submitted under subparagraph (B)) and publish a final programmatic environmental impact statement regarding such area.

(2) With respect to the area of the oceans in which development by any United States citizen will likely first occur under the authority of this title, the Secretary shall prepare draft and final programmatic environmental impact statements as required under paragraph (1) except that—

(A) the draft programmatic environmental impact statement shall be prepared and published within 120 days after the date of the enactment of this Act; and

(B) the final programmatic environmental impact statement shall be prepared and published within 180 days after the date on which the draft statement is published.

(b) APPLICABILITY OF NATIONAL ENVIRONMENTAL POLICY ACT OF 1969.—The approval of any application for a license or permit under section 103(e) shall be deemed to be a "major Federal action" for purposes of section 102 of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969 (42 U.S.C. 4332). In preparing an environmental impact statement which may be required under the preceding sentence with respect to any application for a license or permit, the Secretary shall take into account, and give due consideration to, the information contained in any other environmental impact statement prepared pursuant to this section. Each environmental impact statement which is so required shall be prepared within the 6-month period following the date on which the application for the license or permit concerned is approved by the Secretary.

Sec. 106. Regulations.

(a) IN GENERAL.—As soon as practicable after the date of the enactment of this Act, but not later than 1 year after such date, the Secretary shall issue such regulations, in addition to the regulations referred to in subsection (b), as are necessary and appropriate to carry out titles I, II, and III.

(b) REGULATIONS RELATING TO LICENSES AND PERMITS.—The Secretary shall issue such regulations as may be necessary and appropriate relating to procedural matters pertaining to the issuance, denial, suspension, and revocation of licenses and permits under sections 103 and 104, and shall issue regulations consistent with the following criteria (which criteria shall be applied uniformly by the Secretary in establishing the terms, conditions, and restrictions imposed with respect to each such license and permit):

(1) SIZE OF AREA OF EXPLORATION OR COMMERCIAL RECOVERY.—(A) The Secretary shall determine and specify in each license or permit the size of the area of the deep seabed in which the licensee or permittee may undertake exploration or commercial recovery. The size of any area shall be neither smaller nor larger than necessary to satisfy the following objectives:

(i) The area for exploration shall be sufficient to allow for intensive exploration activities (but may not exceed twice the size of the estimated area in which commercial recovery may be undertaken).

(ii) The area for commercial recovery shall be sufficient to satisfy the permittee's stated production requirements over the term of the permit, taking into account the state of the technology then available for ocean mining and the relevant physical characteristics of the area.

(B) When a licensee obtains a permit for commercial recovery, the area not covered by the permit shall be relinquished.

(2) DURATION.—(A) The term of any license shall be of sufficient duration to allow for a thorough survey of the area of the deep seabed covered by the license and the design, construction, and testing of prototype mining equipment for the area and of prototype processing facilities.

(B) The term of any permit shall be of sufficient duration to allow for commercial recovery of the hard mineral resources in the area which is authorized to be recovered under the permit (which duration shall be based upon related factors such as the depletion of the hard mineral resources within the area concerned, the useful life of the mining equipment and processing facilities, and commercial viability) and shall include a reasonable period of time for the construction of commercial scale mining and processing systems.

(3) PERFORMANCE REQUIREMENT.—(A) Each license shall require such periodic reasonable expenditures for exploration by the licensee as the Secretary shall establish, taking into account the size of the area of the deep seabed covered by the license and the amount of funds which is estimated by the Secretary to be required to commence commercial recovery of hard mineral resources within the area within the time limit established by the Secretary (except that such required expenditures shall not be established at a level which would discourage exploration by persons with less costly technology than is prevalently in use).

(B) The Secretary shall establish with respect to each license a maximum time interval after exploration is completed within which commercial recovery must commence. Such interval shall take into account the time necessary for the construction of mining and processing system, with allowance made for unavoidable delays in such construction.

(C) Once commercial recovery is achieved, the Secretary shall, within reasonable limits and taking into consideration all relevant factors, require the permittee to maintain commercial recovery throughout the period of the permit.

(4) RELINQUISHMENT AND SURRENDER.—Any licensee or permittee may at any time, without penalty—

(A) surrender a license or a permit issued to him; or

(B) relinquish in whole or in part, any area of the deep seabed covered by the license or permit.

Any licensee or permittee who surrenders a license or permit, or relinquishes any area of the deep seabed, shall remain liable with respect to all violations and penalties incurred by him, and damages to persons or property caused by him, as a result of activities engaged in by him pursuant to such license or permit.

(5) RECORDS AND AUDITS.—(A) Each licensee and permittee shall keep such records, consistent with standard accounting principles, as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe. Such records shall include information which will fully disclose expenditures for development and onshore processing of hard mineral resources, and such other information as will facilitate an effective audit of such expenditures.

(B) The Secretary and the Comptroller General of the United States, or any of their duly authorized representatives, shall have access, for purpose of audit and examination, to any books, documents, papers, and records of the licensee or permittee that are necessary and pertinent to verify the expenditures referred to in subparagraph (A).

(6) SUBMISSION OF DATA AND INFORMATION.—Each licensee and permittee shall be required to submit to the Secretary such necessary and reasonable data or other information as the Secretary may need for purposes of making determinations with respect to the issuance, denial, or revocation of any license or permit; complying with the reporting requirement in section 108, and evaluating the exploration or commercial recovery operations engaged in by the licensee or permittee.

(7) PUBLIC DISCLOSURE.—Copies of any record, document, report, or other communication received by the Secretary containing data or information required under this title shall be made available to the public, upon identifiable request therefor, at reasonable cost, unless—

(A) such data or information relates to trade secrets or other confidential matter referred to in section 1905 of title 18 of the United States Code; or

(B) the public release of such data or information is prohibited under any provision of law, including, but not limited to, section 552(b) of title 5 of the United States Code.

(8) PREVENTION OF INTERFERENCE WITH REASONABLE USES OF THE HIGH SEAS.—Each license and permit shall include such restrictions as may be necessary and appropriate to insure that exploration or commercial recovery operations carried out by the licensee or permittee do not unreasonably interfere with the interests of other states in their exercise of the freedoms of the high seas, as recognized under the general principles of international law.

(9) PROTECTION OF THE ENVIRONMENT.—Each license and permit shall contain such terms, conditions, and restrictions with respect to the carrying out of exploration and commercial recovery operations authorized thereunder as are necessary to protect the quality of the environment through utilization of the best practicable technology economically achievable. Before establishing such terms, conditions, and restrictions the Secretary shall consult with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency and take into account, and give due consideration to, the information contained in each final environmental impact statement prepared with respect to such license or permit pursuant to section 105(b).

(10) MONITORING OF OPERATIONS.—Each license and permit shall require the licensee or permittee—

(A) to allow the Secretary to place appropriate Federal officers and employees aboard vessels used by the licensee or permittee in exploration or commercial recovery operations for the purpose of monitoring such operations at such time, and to such extent, as the Secretary deems reasonable and necessary to assess the effectiveness of, and to determine compliance with, the terms, conditions, and restrictions of the license or permit;

(B) to cooperate with such officers and employees in carrying out monitoring functions; and

(C) to submit to the Secretary such information as the Secretary requests for purposes of assessing environmental impacts resulting from the exploration or commercial recovery operations of the licensee or permittee.

Sec. 107. Reciprocating states.

(a) DESIGNATION.—The President, in consultation with the Secretary and the heads of other appropriate departments and agencies, may designate any foreign nation as a reciprocating state if the President determines that such foreign nation—

(1) provides a legal framework for exploration and commercial recovery (pending agreement on an international treaty) which does not unreasonably interfere with the interests of other states in their exercise of the freedom of the high seas, as recognized under general principles of international law;

(2) recognizes licenses and permits issued under this title to the extent that such nation prohibits, under its laws, any person subject to its jurisdiction from engaging in exploration or commercial recovery which conflicts with that authorized under any such license or permit;

(3) recognizes, under its procedures, priorities of right for applications for licenses or permits which are consistent with those provided for in this title and the regulations issued thereunder;

(4) regulates the conduct of persons subject to its jurisdiction who are engaged in exploration or commercial recovery in a manner compatible with that provided for in this Act and the regulations issued thereunder, including, but not limited to, regulation—

(A) requiring such persons to carry out adequate measures for the protection of the marine environment, the orderly and efficient development of hard mineral resources, and the safety of life and property at sea, and

(B) providing for adequate enforcement; and

(5) has established a special fund for the payment of contributions to an international regime (established under an international agreement) for sharing with the international community pursuant to such agreement.

(b) EFFECT OF DESIGNATION.—If any foreign nation is designated as a reciprocating state under subsection (a), no license or permit shall be issued under this title permitting any exploration or commercial recovery which will conflict with any license, permit, or equivalent authorization issued by such reciprocating state.

(c) NOTIFICATION OF APPLICATIONS.—The President shall notify each reciprocating state of the receipt of any application for a license or permit under this title. Such notification shall include appropriate information from such application. The Secretary shall submit to the President such information as is necessary for the President to notify reciprocating states pursuant to this subsection.

(d) REVOCATION OF PARTICIPATION STATE STATUS.—The President, in consultation with the Secretary and the heads of other appropriate departments and agencies, may revoke the designation of a foreign nation as a reciprocating state if the President determines that such foreign nation no longer complies with the requirements of subsection (a).

Sec. 108. Annual report by Secretary.

The Secretary shall submit to the Congress on or before October 31 of each year after 1978 a report on the administration of this Act during the period covered by the report. Such report shall contain, but is not limited to, the following information with respect to the reporting period:

(1) The number of licenses for exploration and permits for commercial recovery issued, denied, suspended, or revoked under section 103 or 104.

(2) A description and evaluation of the exploration and commercial recovery operations undertaken; including, but not limited to, information setting forth the quantities of hard mineral resources recovered and the disposition of such resources.

(3) A description and estimate of any damage to the quality of environment resulting from such operations.

(4) The number and description of all civil and criminal proceedings instituted under title III, and the current status of such proceedings.

(5) Such recommendations as the Secretary deems appropriate for amending this Act to further carry out its purposes.

TITLE II—TRANSITION TO INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT

Sec. 201. Declaration of congressional intent.

It is the intent of Congress—

(1) that any international agreement to which the United States becomes a party should, in addition to promoting other national oceans objectives—

(A) provide assured and nondiscriminatory access, under reasonable terms and conditions, to the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed for United States citizens, and

(B) recognize the rights of United States citizens who have undertaken exploration for, or commercial recovery of, hard mineral resources of the deep seabed under title I before such agreement enters into force with respect to the United States to continue their operations under substantially the same terms, conditions, and restrictions as have been imposed on them under title I and any regulation issued thereunder, or otherwise provide for the continuation of such operations in a manner that does not materially impair the value of investments that have been made in relation to such operations;

(2) that the extent to which any such international agreement conforms to the provisions of paragraph (1) should be determined by the totality of the provisions of such agreement, including, but not limited to, the practical implications for the security of investments of any discretionary powers granted to an international regulatory body, the structures and decisionmaking procedures of such body, the availability of impartial and effective producers for the settlement of disputes and any features that tend to discriminate against exploration and commercial recovery activities undertaken by United States citizens; and

(3) that this Act should be transitional pending—

(A) the adoption of an international agreement at the United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, and the entering into force of such agreement, or portions thereof, with respect to the United States, or

(B) if such adoption is not forthcoming, the negotiation of a multilateral or other treaty concerning the deep seabed, and the entering into force of such treaty with respect to the United States.

Sec. 202. Effect of international agreement.

If an international agreement enters into force with respect to the United States, any provision of title I, II, or III, and any regulation issued thereunder, which is not inconsistent with such international agreement shall continue in effect with respect to United States citizens. The Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of State, shall take all necessary measures to insure, to the maximum extent possible consistent with the provisions of such international agreement, that the integrity of investments previously made by United States citizens in connection with deep seabed mineral exploration and commercial recovery is protected in the implementation of such international agreement. The Secretary shall submit to the Congress, within one year after the date of such entry into force, a report on the actions taken by the Secretary under this section, which report shall include, but not be limited to—

(1) a description of the status of deep seabed mining operations of United States citizens under the international agreement; and

(2) an assessment of whether United States citizens who were engaged in deep seabed mineral exploration or commercial recovery on the date such agreement entered into force have been permitted to continue their operations under substantially the same terms, conditions and restriction and, if applicable, the extent to which the value of their investments may have been impaired by the implementation of the international agreement.

TITLE III—CIVIL PENALTIES, CRIMINAL OFFENSES, AND MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

Sec. 301. Prohibited acts.

It is unlawful for any United States citizen to violate any provision of this title I, II, or III, any regulation issued thereunder, or any term, condition, or restriction of any license or permit issued to him under section 103.

Sec. 302. Civil penalties.

(a) ASSESSMENT OF PENALTY.—Any United States citizen who is found by the Secretary, after notice and an opportunity for a hearing in accordance with section 554 of title 5, United States Code, to have committed any act prohibited by section 301 shall be liable to the United States for a civil penalty. The amount of the civil penalty shall not exceed $50,000 for each violation. Each day of a continuing violation shall constitute a separate offense. The amount of such civil penalty shall be assessed by the Secretary by written notice. In determining the amount of such penalty, the Secretary shall take into account the nature, circumstances, extent, and gravity of the prohibited act committed, and, with respect to the violator, the history of any prior offenses, his demonstrated good faith in attempting to achieve timely compliance after being cited for the violation, and such other matters as justice may require.

(b) REVIEW OF CIVIL PENALTY.—Any United States citizen against whom a civil penalty is assessed under subsection (a) may obtain review thereof in the appropriate court of the United States by filing a notice of appeal in such court within thirty days from the date of the assessment order and by simultaneously sending a copy of such notice by certified mail to the Secretary. The Secretary shall promptly file in such court a certified copy of the record upon which such violation was found or such penalty imposed, as provided in section 2112 of title 28, United States Code. The findings and order of the Secretary shall be set aside by such court if they are not found to be supported by substantial evidence, as provided in section 706(2)(E) of title 5, United States Code.

(c) ACTION UPON FAILURE TO PAY ASSESSMENT.—If any United States citizen fails to pay an assessment of a civil penalty after it has become final, or after the appropriate court has entered final judgment in favor of the Secretary, the Secretary shall refer the matter to the Attorney General of the United States, who shall recover the amount assessed in any appropriate district court of the United States. In such action, the validity and appropriateness of the final order imposing the civil penalty shall not be subject to review.

(d) COMPROMISE OR OTHER ACTION BY SECRETARY.—The Secretary may compromise, modify, or remit, with or without conditions, any civil penalty which is subject to imposition or which has been imposed under this section.

Sec. 303. Criminal offenses.

(a) OFFENSES.—Any United States citizen is guilty of an offense if he willfully and knowingly commits any act prohibited by section 301.

(b) PUNISHMENT.—Any offense described in subsection (a) is punishable by a fine of not more than $250,000 for each day during which the violation continues.

(c) JURISDICTION.—There is Federal jurisdiction over any offense described in this section.

Sec. 304. Enforcement.

The provisions of titles I, II, and III, any regulation issued thereunder, and any term, condition, and restriction of any license or permit issued under section 103 shall be enforced by the Secretary. The Secretary may, by agreement, on a reimbursable basis or otherwise, utilize the personnel, services, equipment (including aircraft and vessels), and facilities of any other Federal agency in the performance of such duties. The Secretary shall issue such regulations as may be necessary and appropriate to carry out the Secretary's enforcement duties under this section.

Sec. 305. Liability of vessels.

Any vessel, except a public vessel engaged in noncommercial activities, used in any violation of title I, II, or III, any regulation issued thereunder, and any term, condition, or restriction of any license or permit issued under section 103 shall be liable in rem for any civil penalty assessed or criminal fine imposed and may be proceeded against in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof.

Sec. 306. Authorization for appropriations.

There are authorized to be appropriated for any fiscal year beginning after September 30, 1978, such sums as may be necessary for the administration of titles I, II, and III.

Sec. 307. Severability.

If any provision of title I, II, or III or any application thereof is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of such title, or of any other application, shall not be affected thereby.

TITLE IV—TAX

Sec. 401. Short title.

This title may be cited as the "Deep Seabed Hard Mineral Removal Tax Act of 1978".

Sec. 402. Imposition of tax on removal of hard mineral resources from deep seabed.

(a) GENERAL RULE.—Chapter 36 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to certain other excise taxes) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subchapter:

"Subchapter F—Tax on Removal of Hard Mineral Resources from Deep Seabed

"Sec. 4495. Imposition of tax.
"Sec. 4496. Definitions.
"Sec. 4497. Imputed value.
"Sec. 4498. Termination.

"Sec. 4495. Imposition of tax.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—There is hereby imposed a tax on any removal of a hard mineral resource from the deep seabed pursuant to a deep seabed permit.

"(b) AMOUNT OF TAX.— The amount of tax imposed by subsection (a) on any removal shall be 3.5 percent of the imputed value of the resource so removed.

"(c) LIABILITY FOR TAX.—The tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be paid by the person to whom the deep seabed permit is issued.

"(d) TIME FOR PAYING TAX.—The time for paying the tax imposed by subsection (a) shall be the time prescribed by the Secretary by regulations. The time so prescribed with respect to any removal shall not be earlier than the earlier of—

"(1) the commercial use of, or the sale or disposition of, any portion of the resource so removed, or

"(2) the day which is 12 months after the date of the removal of the resource.

"Sec. 4496. Definitions.

"(a) DEEP SEABED PERMIT.—For purposes of this subchapter, the term 'deep seabed permit' means a permit issued under title I of the Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Resources Act.

"(b) HARD MINERAL RESOURCE.— For purposes of this subchapter, the term 'hard mineral resource' means any deposit or accretion on, or just below, the surface of the deep seabed of nodules which contain one or more minerals, at laest one of which is manganese, nickel, cobalt, or copper.

"(c) DEEP SEABED.—For purposes of this subchapter, the term 'deep seabed' means the seabed, and the subsoil thereof to a depth of 10 meters, lying seaward of, and outside—

"(1) the Continental Shelf of any nation; and

"(2) any area of national resource jurisdiction of any foreign nation, if such area extends beyond the Continental Shelf of such nation and such jurisdiction is recognized by the United States.

"(d) CONTINENTAL SHELF.—For purposes of this subchapter, the term 'Continental Shelf' means—

"(1) the seabed and subsoil of the submarine areas adjacent to the coast but outside the area of the territorial sea, to a depth of 200 meters or, beyond that limit, to where the depth of the superjacent waters admits of the exploitation of the natural resources of such areas; and

"(2) the seabed and subsoil of similar submarine areas adjacent to the coasts of islands.

"Sec. 4497. Imputed value.

"(a) IN GENERAL.—For purposes of this subchapter the term 'imputed value' means, with respect to any hard mineral resource, 20 percent of the fair market value of the commercially recoverable metals and minerals contained in such resource. Such fair market value shall be determined—

"(1) as of the date of the removal of the hard mineral resource from the deep seabed; and

"(2) as if the metals and minerals contained in such resource were separated from such resource and were in the most basic form for which there is a readily ascertainable market price.

"(b) COMMERCIAL RECOVERABILITY.—

"(1) MANGANESE, NICKEL, COBALT, AND COPPER.—For purposes of subsection (a), manganese, nickel, cobalt, and copper shall be treated as commercially recoverable.

"(2) MINIMUM QUANTITIES AND PERCENTAGES.—The Secretary may by regulations prescribe for each metal or mineral quantities or percentages below which the metal or mineral shall be treated as not commercially recoverable.

"(c) SUSPENSION OF TAX WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN METALS AND MINERALS HELD FOR LATER PROCESSING.—

"(1) ELECTION.—The permittee may, in such manner and at such time as may be prescribed by regulations, elect to have the application of the tax suspended with respect to one or more commercially recoverable metals or minerals in the resource which the permittee intends to hold for at least 1 year without the processing of such metals or minerals. Any metal or mineral affected by such election shall not be taken into account in determining the imputed value of the resource at the time of its removal from the deep seabed. Any suspension under this paragraph with respect to a metal or mineral shall be permanent unless there is a redetermination affecting such metal or mineral under paragraph (2).

"(2) LATER COMPUTATION OF TAX.—If the permittee processes any metal or mineral affected by the election under paragraph (1), or if he sells any portion of the resource containing such a metal or mineral, then the amount of the tax under section 4495 shall be redetermined as if there had been no suspension under paragraph (1) with respect to such metal or mineral. In any such case there shall be added to the increase in tax terminated under the preceding sentence an amount equal to the interest (at rates determined under section 6621) on such increase for the period from the date prescribed for paying the tax on the resources (determined under section 4495(d)) to the date of the processing or sale.

"(d) DETERMINATIONS OF VALUE.—All determinations of value necessary for the application of this subchapter shall be made by the Secretary (after consultation with other appropriate Federal officials) on the basis of the best available information. Such determinations shall be made under procedures established by the Secretary by regulations.

"Sec. 4498. Termination.

"(a) GENERAL RULE.—The tax imposed by section 4495 shall not apply to any removal from the deep seabed after the earlier of—

"(1) the date on which an international deep seabed treaty takes effect with respect to the United States, or

"(2) the date 10 years after the date of the enactment of this subchapter.

"(b) INTERNATIONAL DEEP SEABED TREATY.—For purposes of subsection (a), the term 'international deep seabed treaty' means any treaty which—

"(1) is adopted by a United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, and

"(2) requires contributions to an international fund for the sharing of revenues from deep seabed mining."

(b) CLERICAL AMENDMENT.—The table of subchapters for chapter 36 of such Code is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"Subchapter F. Tax on removal of hard mineral resources from deep seabed."

(c) EFFECTIVE DATE.—The amendments made by this section shall take effect on January 1, 1980.

Sec. 403. Establishment of Deep Seabed Revenue Sharing Trust Fund.

(a) CREATION OF TRUST FUND.—There is established in the Treasury of the United States a trust fund to be known as the "Deep Seabed Revenue Sharing Trust Fund" (hereinafter in this section referred to as the "Trust Fund"), consisting of such amounts as may be appropriated or credited to the Trust Fund as provided in this section.

(b) TRANSFER TO TRUST FUND OF AMOUNTS EQUIVALENT TO CERTAIN TAXES.—

(1) IN GENERAL.—There are hereby appropriated to the Trust Fund amounts determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be equivalent to the amounts of the taxes received in the Treasury under section 4495 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

(2) METHOD OF TRANSFER.—The amounts appropriated by paragraph (1) shall be transferred at least quarterly from the general fund of the Treasury to the Trust Fund on the basis of estimates made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the amounts referred to in paragraph (1) received in the Treasury. Proper adjustments shall be made in the amounts subsequently transferred to the extent prior estimates were in excess of or less than the amounts required to be transferred.

(c) MANAGEMENT OF TRUST FUND.—

(1) REPORT.—It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to hold the Trust Fund, and to report to the Congress for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, and each fiscal year thereafter on the financial condition and the results of the operations of the Trust Fund during the preceding fiscal year and on its expected condition and operations during the fiscal year and the next 5 fiscal years after the fiscal year. Such report shall be printed as a House document of the session of the Congress to which the report is made.

(2) INVESTMENT.—

(A) IN GENERAL.—It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest such portion of the Trust Fund as is not, in his judgment, required to meet current withdrawals. Such investments may be made only in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. For such purpose, such obligations may be acquired (i) on original issue at the issue price, or (ii) by purchase of outstanding obligations at the market price.

(B) SALE OF OBLIGATIONS.—Any obligation acquired by the Trust Fund may be sold by the Secretary at the market price.

(C) INTEREST ON CERTAIN PROCEEDS.—The interest on, and the proceeds from the sale or redemption of, any obligations held in the Trust Fund shall be credited to and form a part of the Trust Fund.

(d) EXPENDITURES FROM TRUST FUND.—If an international deep seabed treaty is in effect with respect to the United States on or before the date 10 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, amounts in the Trust Fund shall be available, as provided by appropriations Acts, for making contributions required under such treaty for purposes of the sharing among nations of the revenues from deep seabed mining. Nothing in this subsection shall be deemed to authorize any program or other activity not otherwise authorized by law.

(e) USE OF FUNDS.—If an international deep seabed treaty is not in effect with respect to the United States on or before the date 10 years after the date of the enactment of this Act, amounts in the Trust Fund shall be available for such purposes as Congress may hereafter provide by law.

(f) INTERNATIONAL DEEP SEABED TREATY.—For purposes of this section, the term "international deep seabed treaty" has the meaning given to such term by section 4498 (b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954.

Sec. 404. Act not to affect tax or customs or tariff treatment of deep seabed mining.

Except as otherwise provided in section 402, nothing in this Act shall affect the application of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954. Nothing in this Act shall affect the application of the customs or tariff laws of the United States.

Mr. BREAUX (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute to H.R. 3350, the text of which is contained in the bill, H.R. 12988. The substitute measure represents a consensus of the Committees on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Interior and Insular Affairs, International Relations, and Ways and Means. Mr. MURPHY, Mr. UDALL, Mr. KAZEN, Mr. ZABLOCKI, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. FRASER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. DERWINSKI have joined me as cosponsors to H.R. 12988. The rule which the House adopted last Friday makes this substitute in order as original text to the bill H.R. 3350.

The administration supports deep ocean mining legislation. Ambassador Richardson, the Special Representative of the President to the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea, has personally reviewed the consensus bill and endorses it.

The deep seabed mining issue is highly complex and its ramifications very far reaching. It has been the object of intense scrutiny and extensive debate. The views which have been expressed on it have been strongly held and widely divergent.

Consequently, the wide support for H.R. 12988 must be regarded as somewhat remarkable. But more importantly, the balance achieved in this compromise amendment must be respected. Proposed amendments to H.R. 12988 must be considered with great care.

As it stands, this consensus substitute provides the kind of investment climate, without investment guarantees, in which deep seabed mining may be assured of going forward. At the same time, the amendment assures that deep seabed mining will be environmentally and internationally responsible. Indeed, it was out of concern for environmental and international considerations that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries accepted for inclusion in H.R. 12988 certain amendments to H.R. 3350 by Interior, International Relations, and Ways and Means, as well as the keystone of the interim deep seabed mining regime created by the bill, the grandfather clause.

In the grandfather clause, the Congress expresses its intent that U.S. miners have under a future law of the sea treaty assured access to deep seabed resources and security of tenure of mine sites. This provision is complemented by a provision for sharing deep seabed mining revenues with the international community. Through these provisions the Congress asks that the international community recognize our established international legal rights, and in return, the United States provides concrete recognition of the notion that deep seabed minerals are the common heritage of mankind.

On the environmental side, H.R. 12988 reflects the fine tuning of a complex and very delicate three-committee consensus. It would be particularly unfortunate if this balance were to be upset.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries began deliberations with Interior and International Relations Committees several months ago. At that time there were some 19 differing issues for us to resolve, and we were successful in resolving 17 of these issues in favor of either the Interior or the International Relations Committees. One of the unresolved issues will be determined by the House today—this is the question of which department will administer the deep sea mining program. Commerce or Interior. The other issue in dispute was whether mining vessels should be U.S. flag only or be permitted to carry the flag of foreign reciprocating nations—nations which have similar deep sea licensing laws. An amendment will be offered to the substitute to require U.S. flag only in order that the environmental and regulatory policies of this act will apply to the vessels carrying out the work.

With the exception of these amendments, I would urge your cautious consideration of any amendments which might strike at the heart of the compromise which this substitute represents.

Mr. ZEFERETTI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ZEFERETTI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12988, the Deep Seabed Mineral Resources Act of 1978. This bill would establish, pending the adoption of an international treaty, a legal framework within which the American maritime and mining industries could begin to harvest the enormous supply of manganese, copper, cobalt, and nickel that lies on the ocean floor.

I support this legislation because it is a reasonable compromise that, in my opinion, correctly assesses the U.S. evolving position in the increasingly interdependent international economy and takes action appropriate to that assessment. The bill demonstrates this Nations acceptance of the United Nation's proclamation that the deep seabed is "the common heritage of mankind," but simultaneously it manifests our intention to promote our national interest vigorously in international relations.

I hope that every Member of Congress shares my belief that the regulatory framework that this legislation would establish is sound; its provisions for licensing, environmental protection, revenue sharing, international cooperation, and transition to an international treaty will insure the orderly and efficient development of the deep seabed. I might add that the bill's careful construction testifies to the hard work that the members of the Ways and Means, International Relations, Interior, and Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committees put into it during their markup sessions.

But if we all agree on the comprehensiveness of the bill itself, our consideration of this bill must turn upon our estimation of whether we should enact this legislation to force the hand of the negotiators at the Law of the Sea Conference. We must weigh our national needs against the concerns of our international negotiators at the Conference.

Our paramount national concern must be the health of American mining and shipping and all of the industries that use manganese, copper, cobalt, and nickel. Our maritime and mining companies have suffered through severe financial problems in recent years, but full scale commercial ocean mining promises to help them toward recovery. In recognition of this prospect, American companies recently have made significant investments in the development of deep seabed mining technology and capacity. It is a fact, however, that American companies, by themselves or as part of international mining consortia, cannot make the multibillion-dollar decisions requisite to full-scale commercial mining without an interim legal framework and the support of the U.S. Government. Moreover, as long as this country's supply of imported minerals remains vulnerable to embargoes and price increases, domestic industries will have to deal with continuing economic uncertainty. Only deep seabed mining can relieve some of this uncertainty.

At present, the Law of the Sea Conference offers little hope of enacting a treaty that will facilitate ocean mining by either the United States or an international mining consortium, for on the issue of ocean mining, the Law of the Sea Conference has reached a stalemate that pits the United States and the industrialized nations against a coalition of developing Third-World nations. This standoff has evolved despite the fact that the United States has made major concessions to the Conference and to the coalition. Although the United States and other nations with the capacity to mine the deep seabed within a few years of receiving the sanctions to do so have agreed in principle to work under an international regulatory structure, in cooperation with an international mining company, and in compliance with a formula of revenue and technology sharing, the Third-World political caucus has obstructed the Conference's efforts to establish a fair licensing and environmental authority, to recognize the validity of free enterprise, and to promote international industrial cooperation. While the Conference sits idly, the fate of vital, abundant mineral resources, of U.S. reliance on imported minerals, and of the financial and employment interests of U.S. industries hangs in the balance.

If the United States desires to take constructive action that balances international considerations with national priorities, the bill before us represents the firmest yet most restrained course of action. The bill clearly expresses concern for the investments of U.S. industry and provides impetus for further development of mining capacities, but it also states that what the United States wants most is international industrial cooperation. Passing this legislation not only will help our troubled domestic industries, but will bring the United States closer to an acceptable and mutually beneficial economic and political relationship with Third-World nations. I think it is fair to characterize this bill as a catalyst for international cooperation.

In light of the protracted proceedings of the Law of the Sea Conference and the urgency of promoting our national interest, I believe that it is time for the Congress to act and force the hand of the negotiators. If we make it clear that our ultimate goal is international economic benefit, I believe that other nations will accept our action.

In a time of scarce resources and a realining world economy, hesitation and obstruction cannot be tolerated, and the United States must lead the way by taking constructive action. H.R. 12988 is constructive action.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. UDALL: On page 8, after line 5, add the following:

"(13) the term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior."

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, the consensus bill before us today, H.R. 12988, is mute on the questions of what department should administer the ocean mining program. My amendment would put this program in the Department of the Interior.

The Department of the Interior has always had responsibility for all Federal involvement in mineral development. The mining law of 1872, the mineral leasing law of 1920, the OCS Lands Act of 1953, all have been managed by the Department of the Interior.

The Department has several thousand employees in the U.S. Geological Survey, and several thousand more work in the Bureau of Mines and the Bureau of Land Management. Together these agencies manage the gathering of information, the advancement of technical expertise, the preparation of environmental impact statements, the leasing, administering, and enforcing of the laws governing our nation's mineral resources.

The best analogy to ocean mining is the development of offshore oil and gas leases. When a land-based technology, the drilling for oil and gas, moved offshore, the new Outer Continental Shelf program came under the purview of the Interior Department. It did not go to the Coast Guard or the Commerce Department. Ocean mining should follow the same pattern, drawing upon the onshore mining and the offshore petroleum drilling expertise of the Department of the Interior, ocean mining's logical home is in Interior.

My support for the Department of the Interior should not be seen as an attack upon the mandate of NOAA. That agency has important responsibilities for monitoring ocean pollution, for collecting scientific information and for advancing competence in oceanographic technologies. But NOAA does not have the experience, the personnel, nor the technical support necessary to run this complex program.

The Interior Committee used as a vehicle for the markup, the bill introduced by Congressmen MURPHY and BREAUX, as reported out by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. The findings and purposes of that bill make the case for Interior Department jurisdiction.

Included in the findings that—

(1) the United States' requirements for hard minerals to satisfy national industrial needs, will continue to expand and that the demand for such minerals will eventually exceed the available domestic sources of supply.

Who better to estimate the need for minerals?

(2) in the case of certain hard minerals, the United States is dependent upon foreign sources of supply and that the acquisition of such minerals from foreign sources is a significant factor in the national balance of payments position.

Who monitors the importations of minerals?

(3) The present and future national interest of the United States requires the availability of hard mineral resources which are independent of the export policies of foreign nations.

Who estimates the availability of minerals?

(4) There is an alternate source of supply of certain hard minerals, including nickel, copper, cobalt, and manganese, which are significant in relation to national needs contained in the nodules existing in great abundance on the deep seabed.

And, who then can estimate alternative sources of minerals?

Looking next at the purposes, there is no question left—

(1) To establish an interim program to encourage and regulate the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed by U.S. citizens, pending to entering into force with respect to the United States of superseding international agreement relating to such activities;

Who best can encourage and regulate the development of minerals?

(2) To insure that the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed are conducted in a manner which will encourage the orderly and efficient development of such resources, will protect the environment, and will promote the safety of life and property at sea.

Who best can insure orderly and efficient resource development?

(3) To allow the continued development of technology necessary to develop the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed as soon as possible.

Who best can allow for technological development of mineral development?

The other findings and purposes speak to policy questions of producing the necessary investment climate and to the Law of the Sea negotiations.

I believe these quotes from the merchant marine bill persuasively argue that jurisdiction for ocean mining should rest with the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona to place the jurisdiction of this program in the Department of the Interior.

I, too, do not want to speak badly of the Department which I am opposing; but I think what we ought to do in deciding which department is going to have jurisdiction over this program, which is a very major program, is that we should look, first of all, to what type of expertise individual departments have in this particular area.

If any Member would look at the comparison sheet that I have sent around to each Member of the House comparing what the Interior Department has done in this area with what the Department of Commerce has already done in this area, I think Members will come to the conclusion, as I have, that it clearly belongs in the department that has the expertise and has had—which is equally important—the interest to do something about deep sea mining so far. The sheet that I have sent out points out that the Department of Commerce already has an Office of Marine Minerals with a $4.5 million annual budget, which they have had for the past 3 years. They have not just sat on that budget or that Office, but have been very aggressive. They already have seven staff members working, and have a very strong program looking at environmental, economic, legal, resource and regulatory deep seabed mining issues.

In the Interior Department, they have an Office of Ocean Mining with an annual budget of only $500,000 in comparison with the $4.5 million of the Department of Commerce. But, more importantly, the Interior Department has only two staff members and the position of Administrator of the Office of Administration for Ocean Mining has been vacant for the past 2 years. They have had such a tremendous interest that they have not even gotten around to appointing a person to head up the office. The office has been vacant for 2 years. NOAA, on the other hand, which is located in the Department of Commerce, is the only Federal agency to conduct onsite deep ocean mining environmental studies. They have spent a great deal of time and effort doing environmental work to determine the effect of it on the environment. Their DOMES onsite oceanographic ships are out in the ocean looking at the potential mining sites and studying what their effect will be.

We have to look at ocean mining as a total package policy. This is also management. The gentleman from Arizona pointed out that the Interior Department has jurisdiction over the Outer Continental Shelf, but the OCS is the management of our own lands of the Continental Shelf. To say that this is the same as ocean mining is absolutely, totally, in my opinion, incorrect. We are talking about international waters. The agency that handles this should have expertise in international problems and law. It should have a blue water fleet capable of going offshore and studying the impact and making sure that everything is correct. The Interior Department has none of this.

In addition I am proud that I am on the side of the Center for Law and Social Policy. They have sent a letter to the chairman of the subcommittee which reads in part as follows:

> As you know, the International Project of the Center for Law and Social Policy has represented the Sierra Club, Environmental Defense Fund, National Audubon Society, Friends of the Earth, National Wildlife Federation, and Natural Resources Defense Council regarding deepsea mining legislation for the last four years. We have testified on numerous occasions in both the House and Senate about various bills, and have submitted comments to the Executive Branch.
> We have always expressed the view that the agency best suited to have authority over deepsea mining is the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA).

NOAA is housed in the Department of Commerce. That is an unusual situation when we have the gentleman from Louisiana with all these environmental groups arguing for the same amendment. If that is the case, it has got to be good.

I think the Department of Commerce has clearly indicated that they have the interest, the expertise, and the budget necessary to be the lead agency. They should not be compared to the OCS or land-based mining because it bears no resemblance. The technology is completely and totally different. The environment is completely different. NOAA has its own management program.

We have to tailor ocean mining to the effect on the coastal zone. The lead agency is NOAA. We should have a comprehensive ocean management program, and not pick and choose. That is why I will be offering an amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona, to designate the Department of Commerce as lead agency in ocean mining.

Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the truth of the matter is that there are elements of expertise that are lodged in both of these executive departments.

The subject matter of this legislation is deepsea mining. The one governmental agency that has traditionally been the repository of knowledge with respect to the mining industry, its problems and its economics has been the Bureau of Mines and USGS. I speak in support of the gentleman from Arizona and the Department of the Interior because I think on balance that is the agency that is best suited to handle both the environmental responsibilities and the municipal recovery administration that will have to be made.

In the Department of Commerce we have lodged there the Government experience in the science of the seas, oceanography. The truth of the matter is whichever Secretary is designated to run this program, that Secretary is going to have to appeal for assistance from the other Government agency. The Secretary of the Interior will have to look to Commerce for help. Commerce, if they got the lead agency, would have to go to Interior for help.

Ideally in the best of all possible worlds and outside the realm of warring bureaucracies, what should be done here is that there should be a task force with representatives appointed by each Secretary—two or three—to carry out and implement this responsibility. But all of us who know and well recognize the disposition, the jealous disposition of bureaucratic entities to do battle with each other over sacred turf will recognize that the task force unfortunately will not work here. It should work and in practical consequence that is what will happen here in any event.

But the Department of Interior is the repository of knowledge that is going to be necessary to make determinations on rules and regulations on recovery of the mineral resources from the ocean floor. In balance it is the Secretary of the Interior who has made all the decisions on offshore and leasing not always perfectly, but knowledgeably—the Department of the Interior is not going to have to contract for new expertise in order to implement the deep sea responsibility. I would urge my fellow members of the committee to support the gentleman from Arizona and the Department of the Interior as the Secretary to be designated in this legislation.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANTINI. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I heard my friend, the gentleman from Louisiana

(Mr. BREAUX), say he was embarrassed, or maybe he said proud, for having some of the environmental groups behind him, and I wanted to relieve him of some of that embarrassment. The gentleman has a letter of July 18 from an organization which undertook to speak for other organizations and announce the support of those other organizations.

However, I had a letter after that from the Friends of the Earth saying they have come to the conclusion that the Department of the Interior is the proper agency to lead in this.

I had a letter the day after the letter referred to by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), from the Environmental Policy Center which said that they strongly support the Department of the Interior for the lead agency in deep seabed mining.

There appears to be some confusion and I hope we will not begin shouting about who the environmental organizations are for. Most of them are for me and the Department of the Interior.

Mr. SANTINI. I thank the gentleman from Arizona.

Perhaps we could come up with a compromise and suggest the Department of Transportation as a truly objective body, especially in view of the fact that we will have to transport these substances from ocean floor to shore.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANTINI. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I was confused until I heard the gentleman from Arizona, and now I am totally convinced it should be the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SANTINI. We cannot account for the gentleman's state of mind or his confusion. This is a liability we all share.

There are equities to suggest the position of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), but I would urge the Members of the Committee to come down on the side of the equities supported by the gentleman from Arizona and name the Department of the Interior as the entity that has the established credentials to carry this responsibility.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BREAUX AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. UDALL

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BREAUX as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. UDALL: At page 8, after line 5, add the following:

"(13) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of Commerce".

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to find the letter dated July 26 that I had but we do not seem to have that letter with us.

Nevertheless, I think when we are discussing which environmental groups are supporting which department, the Center for Law and Social Policy is the one supporting the Department of Commerce. The other gentleman has a letter in which the Environmental Policy Center indicates support of the Interior Department, but if that issue is confusing, and it certainly is, the other point that we have to consider is just as confusing and that is the experts that are connected with the various departments.

However, when you look at the record I believe that honestly and objectively you have to admit that the Department of Commerce is the proper department. That is the department that covers the oceans. It has the ocean agency, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration, as the lead Federal administering agency for the development of ocean mining in the United States.

It is the Department that regulates the oceans for the United States. It is the Department that has within it, NOAA, which is in charge of our Federal ocean's program.

It is very clear to me, and to all members of the committee that when you are talking about deep sea mining you are talking about areas that belong not to the United States, but which are in international waters.

Further, when we are talking about oceans, Mr. Chairman, we are talking about the only agency that has a person who is serving as the lead ocean mining administrator in this Government. I might add that the Department of the Interior has not gotten around to filling its vacancy that was created 2 years ago, so evidently they are not that concerned about the ocean program we are talking about.

When you talk about the deep ocean mining environmental study (DOMES), it is NOAA that we are talking about, for the purpose of studying the potential effects of ocean mining. They have the ability and they have the technology and they have the very, very important engineering know-how. If we are going to have an ocean mining program we want to be ready. If we select another department, then you have to start from point No. 1, start from scratch. The Department of Commerce already has come up with the programs and ability to move forward on this problem of our resources in international waters. This program is not the same as mining on the Continental Shelf, this is not mining on land we own that the Department of the Interior has the responsibility for, this is something entirely different.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I respectfully suggest to the committee that the wise, the clear and the only choice to make is that the Department of Commerce is the only leading agency in this field.

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the Breaux amendment, which designates the Department of Commerce and primarily the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration as the administering agency for the development of ocean mining in the United States. Given the nature of this particular common property resource which raises many foreign policy and economic questions in terms of its management, it becomes clear that the Department of the Interior has simply not had the requisite experience with the type of resource in which property rights are still evolving.

The Department of the Interior has traditionally been involved in the management of what are clearly nationally owned resources or with resources in which clear property rights exists. When we move into the ocean environment and the management of ocean resources, this clarity of property rights over resources, which can be freely transferred between individuals or governments, consistent with market principles, tends to disappear.

In the case of deep seabed manganese nodules, because they lie beyond most nations' areas of national jurisdiction, ownership is unclear. Our government has argued in the past that the exploitation of these minerals is simply a matter of first come-first served subject to reasonable use of the high seas. The minerals belong to no one until they are actually reduced to capture.

A more recent U.N. Assembly resolution has declared that these resources of the deep seabed are part of "the common heritage of mankind." The United States agreed to this resolution with a proviso that the concept of "the common heritage of mankind" was yet to be defined through some type of Law of the Sea Treaty. Theoretically, it is this eventual treaty which will define or clarify the resource rights pertaining to the deep seabed. However, at this time, these resource property rights in the deep seabed are extremely unclear, and for the United States to simply allow the Department of the Interior to manage these resources identical to the ways that they manage land-based copper mines, coal lands, or even outer Continental Shelf resources (in which the United States effectively owns the resource pursuant to the 1958 Convention on the Continental Shelf and the Truman Proclamation) would be wrong.

At this time, in the debate surrounding the issues of who will exploit and will benefit from the mining of deep seabed resources, there are simply too many unsettled international and foreign policy considerations as well as economic issues which relate to the management of these unique resources to simply proceed at full speed ahead with ocean mining under the leadership of the Federal agency which manages our "Interior" resources.

In addition, I would simply like to point out two additional considerations which point toward NOAA as the logical ocean mining agency. First, it already has a significant fleet of ocean-going research vessels which will be able to conduct monitoring of ocean mining activities and further environmental studies which are necessary as this industry develops. Second, in the general area of ocean resource management, particularly fisheries, where clear property rights have also been somewhat absent in the past, NOAA has acquired considerable expertise and experience in managing these resources in order to achieve efficient and optimum rates of development. I would strongly argue that to suddenly attempt to impose the responsibility for the management of ocean resources within the agency which has only had experience in the area of land-based resource management would be a mistake.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I think that we have to also look at existing agencies and their existing clientele group when you designate an agency to manage a new resource which could be a major contributor to our future supply of important raw materials. There is a tendency among the Group of 77 at the Law of the Sea Conference to be most concerned about the potential impact of minerals from the deep seabed on existing markets for cobalt, copper, nickel, and manganese, but especially nickel.

Any time we have a major innovation which provides a significant new source of supply of a particular raw material, the existing producer becomes extremely concerned about the rate at which this new industry develops. I expect that although most concern thus far has been expressed by the group of 77 in this area, that there may be some resistance to deep seabed mining domestically for the reasons I have suggested. Therefore, it seems logical, at least initially, to place the administration of ocean mining in an agency which is not currently dependent on existing land-based mining interests. For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the Breaux amendment as a means to achieve efficient development of ocean minerals in this unique area of resource management which has significant international implications.

Mr. KAZEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to take issue with the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) and to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL) which would place the jurdisdiction over the program established by this bill in the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. Chairman, the only agency that we have heard from in the Department of Commerce which could conceivably be assigned responsibility for the program is NOAA. But I would call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) to the fact that to date NOAA has no experience whatsoever in the actual management of mineral resources. In fact, their primary experience in this area has been to conduct the so-called DOMES program—the deep ocean mining environmental studies program.

As has already been mentioned, I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the total technical funding for the first DOMES program was $2,959,000. Of this amount NOAA expended $1,041,000 in research contracts with universities and private consulting groups, or 35 percent of the total. More significantly, however, they contracted with the U.S. Geological Survey for 22 percent of the work, or $639,000.

The Geological Survey, of course, is an agency of the Department of the Interior. The U.S. Bureau of Mines is already engaged in deep seabed mining technology assessment, the evaluation and control of seabed mining processes, and nodule analysis. The Bureau is the world's foremost gatherer of world mineral supply and demand information. The U.S. Geological Survey's Conservation and Geologic Divisions are presently engaged in such things as ocean mineral deposit evaluations, geologic hazards evaluation, review of operating plans for the exploration and mineral production on the Outer Continental Shelf, and development of deep seabed instrumentation.

Clearly the expertise is in the Department of the Interior, and I challenge anyone on the floor to put up NOAA's experience with the experience of the Department of the Interior.

I urge support for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona as the Secretary of the Interior is the proper manager of this particular program.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAZEN. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The reason I asked the gentleman, my good friend from Texas, to yield is that he mentioned the nonfuels mineral study that has been initiated by the Department of the Interior. I am glad, because I think probably the gentleman, along with the gentleman from Nevada (Mr. SANTINI) asked the Interior Department to do the study. But I want to point out that of all the studies that it includes, it does not have anything to do with ocean minerals. It specifically does not include ocean minerals as one of the areas they are going to look at. The study by the Department of Commerce that NOAA did was contracted with MIT to do a totally economic computer model on ocean mining.

Mr. KAZEN. I submit that what they did was contract out their work. The universities did their work for them. NOAA did not have a thing to do with it. They contracted the entire work, and in the process they contracted with the Department of the Interior to do some of the research.

Mr. BREAUX. If the gentleman will yield further, the NOAA contract was with the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. At least, they contracted it out to study ocean mining. The Department of the Interior made a study, but it did not even include ocean minerals as one of the subjects.

Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAZEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. SANTINI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I support the gentleman's remarks. I would observe additionally that when the DOMES I program was funded for $2.434 million, it is interesting to note, in the grand bureaucratic tradition, that a half million dollars of that was spent for administrative costs.

Mr. KAZEN. Exactly.

Mr. SANTINI. Not that that is a precedent unique to the Department of Commerce, but I think traditionally it has to be observed that the Department of Commerce had to turn immediately to the USGS, to the Department of Interior, and say, Here, take the job and do it. We do not have the people with the knowledge and expertise to accomplish the goal.

It should be pointed out that in our national mineral policy that is being conducted right now—and I would correct the record with regard to this point—the minerals of the sea will be examined by that interagency study or as a potential source to relieve our critical mineral shortage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. KAZEN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. KAZEN. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. SANTINI. I thank the gentleman for yielding again.

They will examine the minerals that are in the sea as a possible answer to our mineral shortage supply problems. It is a part of the mineral survey that is being headed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the gentleman has very well stated that in the one instance we have had an opportunity to examine, the Department of Commerce, dealing with and relative to minerals in the sea, has had to go to the Department of the Interior to get the job done.

Mr. KAZEN. There is no question about it. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. Clearly the supervision of this program should lie in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Breaux substitute amendment.

My colleague from Louisiana has noted some strong and compelling reasons for placing Federal jurisdictional responsibility for deep seabed mining within the Department of Commerce. It should also be pointed out that there are equally compelling reasons for not placing this responsibility within the Department of the Interior.

The Department of the Interior has traditionally been responsible for leasing of mineral rights, both within the interior and on the outer Continental Shelf. But the leasing of these rights is only one component of a much broader mission. That mission is to administer and regulate the use of public lands of the United States as trustee for the owners of those lands, the people of the United States. The Department of the Interior's job as trustee is to see these lands are used in a way that maximizes the Nation's welfare. Sometimes this means mining; sometimes this means abstaining from mining in order to protect fish, wildlife, or water quality.

The need to balance all these possible land uses is the very rationale for placing such diverse agencies as the Bureau of Mines, Bureau of Reclamation, and Fish and Wildlife Service within this one Department. The point to remember is that mining is not the pervading theme of the Department of the Interior's activities. They do not, after all, do the actual mining. The pervading theme is management of U.S. publicly owned lands and their resources.

The difference between the mineral resources managed by the Department of the Interior and those of the deep seabed is that the former are clearly owned by the people of the United States, but the latter, being in international waters, are not. The minerals of the deep seabed are nobody's property until somebody recovers them. This is the same principle of res nullius that applies to living marine resources such as fish beyond the national resources zones and the Continental Shelf. Since the United States makes no claim of ownership of resources on the international deep seabed, it is clearly improper to have recovery of these resources administered by a department whose basic mission is, by its very definition, so strongly identified with administration of territories under U.S. sovereignty.

To pursue this last point further, our bill has gone to painstaking lengths to disavow and avoid any implication that a claim of sovereignty over resources lying in international waters is being made by the United States. The State Department has even gone so far as to say that the very language of the bill itself is of a diplomatically sensitive nature. Imagine then, if you will, the implications of our naming the U.S. Department of the Interior to administer the recovery of deep seabed resources. The clear message, though unintended, to the international community would be that we in the United States consider the deep seabed to be, like our Outer Continental Shelf and interior lands, just another one of our public lands. This is exactly what we have so carefully been attempting to avoid in the drafting of the bill.

The ocean mining activities we will be licensing through this legislation will be taking place in the middle of the ocean. Given this fact, it is clearly most sensible that responsibility for supervising ocean mining be delegated to the lead Federal oceans agency. This is, of course, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) within the Department of Commerce.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, first, I want to eliminate some confusion in the minds of some persons. The gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) and the distinguished chairman, I understand, are going to have a very important and constructive amendment to this bill later on and I intend to fully support that; but I would not want our support of that amendment to be confused with the issue before us. On the issue before us, I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana. I support the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

Among other things, we should not be alarmed about the role of one or another of our executive agencies. By and large, they look just about alike to the people and governments in our countries.

More specifically, there are some 3,000 islands in the Pacific that are part of the Trust Territories that are under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior and this matter is in the course of being resolved by negotiations—negotiations that must of necessity include the Department of the Interior.

I think it much more rational that this authority in this legislation be in the Department of the Interior, rather than in the Department of Commerce.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the Breaux amendment and in support of the Udall amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of Mr. UDALL's amendment which places the responsibility for the administration of deep seabed mining activities with the Secretary of the Interior.

No one can dispute that both the Department of Commerce and the Department of Interior have valid interests in the resources of the ocean. Both Departments can, and have, produced long lists of agencies, bureaus, offices, and other bureaucratic subdivisions which have produced studies, reports, position papers, scientific data, and environmental impact statements relating to the sea. Both Departments can claim significant input into the ongoing law of the sea conference negotiations on the future of the ocean resources.

Mr. BREAUX, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. MURPHY have told you that Commerce's role has been more important. Mr. UDALL and Mr. KAZEN argue that Interior's has been. The truth is that the agencies of both Departments have often worked together to achieve a common goal. The DOMES study which Mr. BREAUX relies on for example—deep ocean mining environmental study—is billed as a national oceanic and atmospheric administration project (NOAA). But the fact is, as Mr. KAZEN points out, that the U.S. Geological Survey under the Interior Department provided significant environmental and geologic data for use by NOAA. Do not get me wrong, I am not being critical of NOAA or trying to discourage cooperation between agencies. This should continue no matter which Department administers this act.

What I do want to make clear is that anyone who states that the Bureau of Mines or the Geological Survey lack the expertise for deep seabed mining is flat wrong.

So now you might be thinking "with all this expertise in both Departments, what difference does it make which has jurisdiction? Why should I vote for the Department of Interior?"

I can answer that question with several very good reasons from both a historical and practical point of view.

First, let me remind you again of the title of the bill we are considering—the Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act. From the time the Department of the Interior was created in 1849, Congress has entrusted, through various laws, the assessment, management, and protection of the Nation's minerals, both on land and under the sea, to Interior. The mining law of 1872, the Mineral Leasing Act of 1920, the Mining and Minerals Policy Act of 1970, and the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act of 1953, are just a few examples. The Outer Continental Shelf Act is very important because it extended the Department's mineral authority—coal, gas, and other minerals—to lands beneath the sea, as well as other public lands. But today, if we give the Commerce Department administration over the deep seabed, we would be reversing longstanding historical precedent and be saying in effect, "If you mine in California, Kansas, Kentucky, or on the Continental Shelf off Georgia, you deal with Interior. But if you go a little farther out in the ocean to mine, you deal with Commerce." This makes no sense and could create a bureaucratic nightmare.

If we intended to restrict Interior's mining jurisdiction to dry land, we could have shifted the administration of the Outer Continental Shelf leasing provisions to Commerce early this Congress—during consideration of H.R. 1614. But we did not.

This leads me to the second good reason for designating the Interior Department as the lead agency is a very practical one. For 25 years, Interior has been administering oil and gas exploration and licensing on the Outer Continental Shelf. The experience gained—over this quarter century—will be of enormous value administering the deep seabed.

On page 57 of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee Report, the Deputy Comptroller General writes:

> We strongly encourage instead, examination and adoption, of an exploration and leasing system which, in a manner similar to the existing system for the outer continental oil and gas resources would provide payments to the Government for these public resources.

And earlier in the merchant marine report on page 37 referring to environmental impact assessments, it is stated:

> An analogy can be made to the preparation of draft and final environmental impact statements in the Outer Continental Shelf oil and gas field.

But these are not the only sources which strongly suggest Interior as the proper department. In the report of the Commission on Marine Science, Engineering and Resources, which was the result of the Congress directive under Public Law 89-459 to study "the effective use of the vast resources that lie within and below the sea," it was found that:

The procedures under the Outer Continental Shelf Lands Act have worked well and should not be abandoned lightly. (P. 136)

And the Commission recommended on page 137—so this is not Mr. UDALL or myself speaking—and I quote:

The Commission recommends that when deemed necessary to stimulate exploration. The Secretary of the Interior be granted the flexibility to award rights to develop hard minerals on the Outer Continental Shelf without requiring competitive bidding. The Federal rule in this matter also would provide a suitable model for the States.

Not once in the Commission's entire report is it never even suggested that the Department of Commerce should be in charge. In every instance the Commission refers to the Department of the Interior—as lead agency.

The Commission's recommendations were made with full knowledge that the procedures for deep seabed mining would be only similar—not identical—to oil and gas leasing and after acknowledging and encouraging joint roles and the blending of expertise from the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (Commerce) and the Bureau of Mines (Interior).

I would also note that the environmental policy center lends its strong support for the Department of the Interior as the lead agency.

I would finish by stating again this is a seabed mining bill. Mining always has been and should always remain within the jurisdiction of Interior. I urge my colleagues for both historical and practical reasons to vote to keep it that way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ) has expired.

(On request of Mr. ECKHARDT and by unanimous consent, Mr. SKUBITZ was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKUBITZ. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have been very interested in what the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ) has said. I came to this body today without having been totally convinced either way. I have served on the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and I have heard this bill on that committee, and I know that that committee has done an excellent job in the study of this issue. I now serve on the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, as does the gentleman from Kansas.

But I am convinced, by what the gentleman in the well has said, that the practical thing to do is to have all of mining jurisdiction with respect to hard minerals under the Department of Interior and Insular Affairs. I think the gentleman has made a very good case, and I wish to join him and to support his recommendation in this matter.

Mr. SKUBITZ. I thank my colleague for his contribution.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, let me point out the obvious—that the Members who have been speaking for or against this amendment tend to reflect the basic constituency that they serve in their committee. So it is not surprising that members of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs should feel the special expertise lies with that Department.

I am able to address this subject objectively. Serving as I do on the Committee on International Relations, my special interest, if any, is the State Department. I have no desire to insist that jurisdiction lie with the Department of State. So looking at this with total objectivity, one might say, with the dispassionate approach of one who would be, a justice of the International Court in The Hague, that is the kind of approach I am using on this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that the logic, the preponderance of evidence, lies with the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY). I think the position they have outlined is solid. I think the position in the Breaux amendment, which would designate the Department of Commerce as the technical vehicle, is a practical one.

Therefore, speaking on behalf of those objective Members who are not locked into this little civil war between departments of our Government, I would earnestly recommend support for this portion of the Breaux amendment and rejection of the Udall position.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 214, noes 184, answered "present" 1, not voting 33, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Le Fante for, with Mr. Jenrette against.

Mr. Shipley for, with Mr. Staggers against.

Mrs. Collins of Illinois for, with Mr. Fraser against.

Mr. McCLORY and Mr. ULLMAN changed their vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. SCHEUER changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to address a question to the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY). In section 2(b)(2) of the bill, on page 4, there is a reference to "the orderly and efficient development of such resources."

As I recall, the Committee on International Relations' version had in that place a reference to "the orderly development and conservation of such resources." I am sure conservation of resources is a goal we all share, and I wonder if my colleague, the gentleman from New York, can explain for the record why the concept of "efficient development" was substituted for the concept of "conservation."

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I thank my colleague for yielding.

The gentleman is correct that we all share the goal of conserving resources. However, the conservation of natural resources in the Committee on International Relations version of the bill raised serious questions of definition. We were particularly concerned that there was the implication of production controls inherent in that phrase. Consequently, we urged that "orderly and efficient development" be substituted as a phrase with somewhat greater precision. I would assure the gentleman, however, that it is the intent of this language that the commercial recovery activity authorized in the bill take place in a manner which would promote conservation of the resources in the sense that such resource retrieval would not be wasteful.

At the same time, although the phrase is intended to refer to the sound principle of resource management, specifically the reduction of waste, it is clearly not intended to grant, imply, or make any inference of production controls or price regulations. Clearly, prices, profits, market conditions, and the volume of production are matters beyond the scope of this phrase, the control of which is certainly not authorized.

Mr. BINGHAM. So it is the intent of this language to insure that development take place in a way which promotes conservation of the resources, not in the sense of production controls, which are clearly not authorized, but in the sense that they will not be wasted.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. The gentleman states the case correctly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. M'CLOSKEY

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCLOSKEY:

On page 9, at line 22, delete "with respect" and insert in lieu thereof, "based on a work plan referring".

On page 12, strike lines 10–25 inclusive and insert in lieu thereof, "(D) any license for exploration or any permit for commercial recovery if the work plan for such license or permit describes an area of the deep seabed the same as that described in a work plan for a license or permit issued to that applicant which has been surrendered, relinquished or revoked under section 104 within the preceding 3 years;"

"(E) any license for exploration or any permit for commercial recovery, if the work plan for such license or permit would conflict with: (i) any work plan for any pending application for a license or permit to which priority of right for issuance applies; (ii) any work plan for any existing license or permit; or (iii) any equivalent authorization which has been previously issued by a reciprocating state.".

On page 14, after "applications." add, "Each application shall contain a work plan describing—(A) the location of the area of the seabed proposed to be explored or where commercial recovery activities will be conducted;

"(B) a schedule of exploration or commercial recovery activities, and a description of the system to be employed, such information to be used by the Secretary in determining whether the applicant is carrying out such activities with due diligence;

"(C) a schedule of expenditures for exploration or commercial recovery activities; and,

"(D) proposed measures to protect the environment and to monitor the environmental impact of the operations.".

On page 15, after line 15, insert "(D) the applicant's proposed work plan meets the requirements of the Act and the regulations promulgated pursuant thereto."

On page 18, at line 8, delete "area which is" and insert in lieu thereof, "activities".

On page 26, line 9, after "permits" insert, ", or modification of work plans,".

On page 26, strike lines 14–25 inclusive, and on page 27, strike lines 1–9 inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof:

"(1) WORK PLAN.—(A) The area for exploration shall be of sufficient size to allow for intensive exploration activities.

"(B) The area for commercial recovery shall be of sufficient size to meet estimated production requirements.

"(C) The areas for exploration or commercial recovery shall be reasonably regular in shape.

"(D) When a licensee obtains approval of a work plan associated with a permit for commercial recovery, the work plan with his license shall be relinquished.".

On page 27, on lines 12 and 13, delete "the license" and insert in lieu thereof "its work plan".

On page 27, on lines 18 and 19, delete "which is authorized to be recovered under the permit" and insert in lieu thereof "covered by its work plan".

On page 28, at line 5, delete "the license" and insert in lieu thereof "its work plan."

On page 29, starting on line 5 through line 6, delete "area of the deep seabed" and insert in lieu thereof "right to conduct any deep seabed activity".

On page 29, at line 8, delete "area of the deep seabed" and insert in lieu thereof "such right".

Mr. McCLOSKEY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read, and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Reserving the right to object, would the gentleman provide this gentleman with a copy of the amendment?

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman. the amendment that I offer is simple. What it does, from an international law standpoint, is attempt to remove any inference that in enacting this bill the U.S. Government is claiming jurisdiction over any area of the seabed beyond the 200 mile limit of the United States. The reason for this bill is to permit U.S. mining companies to carry out what has been considered to be a right under international law that all nations and all individuals on the high seas have the right of access to such resources on the seabed as they can recover. But it is an equally strong principle of international law, and has been espoused by the United States since our inception as a Nation, that no nation has the right to claim jurisdiction over any block of ground beyond a nation's territorial waters.

Ambassador Elliot Richardson put it this way in his testimony to our committee:

I think it is important . . . to get across as clearly as possible that the United States is not purporting to establish a claim of sovereignty over a portion of the seabed. If that impression were to be created, no matter how slight a foundation, it could trigger comparable claims by other countries. And, we could end up seeing the whole seabed carved up among competing national claims in the way the continent of Africa was once carved up.

Secretary of Commerce Kreps of the Commerce Department put it this way in testimony before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries:

Neither the United States nor the miner would have any territorial or property right in an area. U.S. jurisdiction would be purely in person, that is, over the licensee, not the area subject to the license.

Now, what I have done in this amendment is to replace that language in the bill which referred to an area over which the permittee would have rights with language providing for a work plan which describes the area in which a miner will be permitted to operate. It is clear from this language, the substitute language of my amendment, that we are granting the permittee a right in person to extract minerals pursuant to a work plan that is approved and in no way are we asserting jurisdiction as a nation over that area in which we are permitting him to operate.

The words may be seen by some to be cosmetic, but in this case where we are passing this legislation with the hope that it will serve as a stimulus to those countries that are engaged in negotiations with us at the Law of the Sea Conference, I think it is essential that those nations, particularly the group of 77, some of whom have made territorial claims out to 200 miles, believing that our U.S. bill asserting a 200-mile fishery jurisdiction gave them that right, I think it imperative that these nations be clear in the knowledge that we are not asserting international jurisdiction over territory, but merely assigning rights to U.S. citizens the same as other nations and their citizens enjoy.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY).

Serving with the gentleman during the last several years as a congressional member of the U.S. delegation to the Law of the Sea Conference, I am aware of his diligent efforts to secure a forward-looking Sea Law Treaty protecting our Nation's legitimate interests and at the same time respecting the legitimate interests of other States.

I support the McCloskey amendment, as does the administration, and I agree with the Environmental Policy Center's conclusion that the work plan is a "key amendment which must be included in the final passage of the bill if Congress is going to pass a strong ocean mining bill."

The amendment would avoid the disadvantageous policy of adopting legislation giving the impression that the United States is attempting, through its mining licensing and permit granting procedures, to establish a claim of sovereignty over portions of the seabed. Moreover, the amendment will ultimately give the Secretary more authority to insure responsible and orderly development of an ocean mining site.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment enabling our mining interests to proceed even more effectively than current provisions of H.R. 12988 would allow, while at the same time strengthening our position at the Law of the Sea talks by not giving the impression that the United States has unilaterally acted to establish sovereign claims over deep seabed areas.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Chairman, I would just like to say in conclusion that this may be deemed by some to be an amendment of words, rather than substance; but those of us who have attended the United Nations Law of the Sea negotiations, as have the gentleman from New York and I, must confirm that in many cases, dealing with the delegates of Third World nations in international negotiations or who are dealing with an explosive situation back home, with a constituency who may view the industrial nations as imperialists, to those delegates, the appearance of those words and language are sometimes more important than the substance itself.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I support the gentleman's amendment for all the reasons he stated.

I want to add that we should have dealt with this matter in committee. At the time the matter was before the committee the administration had not decided exactly what it wanted to do in this area.

I am correct, am I not, in my understanding that the administration helped in drafting this amendment and in fact supports this amendment?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, the administration did not draft the amendment, but we based the amendment on the administration's position, and we understood it would be in accord with what the administration wanted. I understand the administration now supports the amendment.

Mr. UDALL. The point I want to make is that in the Outer Continental Shelf Act we have a leasing program, and we have to submit a development and production plan to show how a lessee is going to develop a lease, whether it will be done in an orderly way.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's amendment is very similar to that provision, and I think it makes very good sense. I support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BINGHAM, and by unanimous consent, Mr. McCLOSKEY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) and also with the remarks of the gentleman from Arizona (Mr. UDALL), as well as my colleague from the Committee on International Relations, the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

This amendment was not considered in the Committee on International Relations as such, but I think had it been considered, it is very likely a majority of the committee would have taken the position the gentleman has outlined, and for the reasons he has outlined, I strongly support his amendment.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) because I do not think that it is a good solution to a problem that I believe the commitee bill has handled very carefully.

The gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) points out that one of the problems with this legislation was that we wanted to make sure other nations of the world do not get the opinion or the impression, Heaven forbid, that the United States is telling our companies that they have the right to go out and mine an area and that thereby that might constitute a sort of claim of ownership by the United States of an international area.

What our committee has done is to say to a company, "When you get a license or permit, we are going to tell you"—and I want the Members to get this—"we are going to tell you where you can go and explore and mine."

I do not see how a company that is getting a license or permit and spending $500–$750 million or so to put this operation together is going to be able to rely on something that does not at least tell them the area in which they can operate. That is not going to have the effect of telling the Third World countries that we are claiming ownership over this area.

If we look at the legislation, on page 8 of the committee compromise, it says that in the event of giving a license or permit to a company, covering any area designated in the license or permit, the United States "does not thereby assert sovereignty or sovereign or exclusive rights over, or the ownership of, any area of the deep seabed."

What we are merely saying in the license or permit is that this company is going to be able to operate in this area.

The gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY) will probably say, "Well, the work plan will say the same thing," but there is a very big difference. The license or permit will be public. The license or permit will be international. The license or permit will be able to be read by every country in the world, and they will be able to say that, yes, the U.S. companies are operating in this particular area. It is important that they know that because they would say, "We have got to run our ships through that area with reasonable regard to the U.S. operations, we have got to run our fishing vessels through that area in that same reasonable manner."

The work plan is very deficient, because the work plan would not be published in the Federal Register; it would be hidden somewhere between the companies and our Department of Commerce.

It is very important that everyone be on notice to the effect that this is the area where U.S. companies are going to be operating. The work plan is deficient, because it does not do that. It is very important that everyone know the area in which companies are going to be operating.

That is the only thing the license or permit does. It is clearly not a declaration of ownership, and everyone will agree with that.

Mr. Chairman, I urge defeat of the McCloskey amendment.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I support the position of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) and will state that I am opposed to this amendment.

I think this amendment would only place further unnecessary impediments in the very carefully worked out plan that the committee has drafted. In about 50 sections of this legislation we have written in the proper planning for the development of the deep ocean resources. We certainly want to go on notice to other nations of the world that are interested and have the capability and the technology to mine in the deep ocean, that we are talking about a certain area, and that we have advertised its areas that U.S. companies are going to mine. We placed environmental considerations in the bill, and we have very carefully placed virtually every consideration in the text of this bill.

The gentleman's amendment would only add further impediments and further delays to an already overly delayed subject.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to the gentleman, because I think he stated the issue precisely, and I adopt the very words the gentleman used.

If the purpose of the bill is to say to other countries that, because we have granted a license to mine, they are not to put their ships through that 40-kilometer square or 1,600-square-kilometer area; then the world will assume that the United States is claiming a right to deny to the ships of other countries the right to put their own ships into the area.

Bear in mind what this could mean to our seapower, the claim that one nation can deny to others the use of any given area of the high seas. We should consider the concept of freedom of the seas, which the United States has traditionally exposed. I think the point is stated squarely. I think in this case we ought to defer to international relations concern rather than to mining interests. As the gentleman described what he feels the bill does, we would create an inference we do not intend, that we wish other nations to keep their ships out of the area we have licensed. This mining operation in a 4-square-mile area may be no more than two ships sailing side by side at a relatively slow speed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) has expired.

(On request of Mr. MURPHY of New York and by unanimous consent, Mr. BREAUX was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman from California, and I think the other Members clearly would recognize that under the 1958 Geneva Convention, the United States and many other countries and, under customary law, every nation of the world is under a duty to have reasonable regard for the exercise by other nations of their high seas freedoms. In other words, it is a freedom of the high seas for the U.S. fishing vessels to go out into international waters to take fish. If other countries of the world know we are fishing in the area, they are under a duty to have reasonable regard for our exercising our freedom of the high seas.

This is the same issue here. Other countries of the world ought to be on notice by a public pronouncement through a public license or permit that the United States is licensing or permitting our U.S. citizens to have the right to mine and they will be able to mine in this area.

Other nations of the world will know the U.S. companies are mining in this area, and I think it is going to go a very long way in preventing any conflict, that they cannot go in and say, "We did not know you were out there." They will know if the gentleman's amendment is defeated. How are they to know where the U.S. mining ships are operating? I think if we do not defeat the amendment we will have a lot more problems. I urge defeat of the amendment.

The United States and numerous other countries have for many years specified areas of the high seas for many purposes. We have designated high seas areas for missile tests, naval exercises, weapons tests, dumping sites, safety zones, security zones, and many other things. This notice has itself been required to show reasonable regard toward other states' high seas uses. In turn, this notice has enabled states to show reasonable regard for the uses carried out in the specified area by the state giving notice.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman states the case accurately. We might say that probably about 80 percent of the key navigational issues have already been resolved internationally. The question of navigation through straits does not enter into an issue here of a work plan. The question of navigation in economic zones, the question of the 200-mile limit, the question of archipelago intrusion, those are all separate and distinct. What we have clearly done and what this amendment would impede would be the fact that we have clearly stated that this is an area that the United States proposes to mine, a U.S. consortium, perhaps, and we are serving notice up front that that is the case. I do not see any reason to confuse that issue.

Mr. Chairman, I compliment the gentleman for his very articulate evaluation.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman previously raised the issue about the description of the area that would be included under a work plan, and inferred that there may be some question about the location of the mining area under the McCloskey amendment.

Permit me to point out that the McCloskey amendment does require specification of a work plan. And, as a matter of fact, it states that each application shall contain a work plan that describes the location of the area of the seabed proposed to be explored.

The McCloskey amendment to section 103, subsection (D), on page 14, states:

> Each application shall contain a work plan describing—(a) the location of the area of the seabed proposed to be explored or where commercial recovery activities shall be conducted—

Mr. BREAUX. If the gentleman will allow me to comment, there is no argument about that. However, that agreement is between the licensee and the department issuing the license. Other nations around the world are not privy to that information. It is not made public. It is kind of hidden between the licensee and the department issuing the license.

That is my whole argument. It should be made public because we have said clearly that it is not a declaration of ownership. We have said that we are just telling where our ships are operating, and we are saying that we think they should know that.

Mr. GILMAN. Both proposals, the McCloskey and the existing language, are based upon public disclosures of the work areas. And the objective of the McCloskey amendment is precisely what the gentleman suggests, that it is not a declaration of ownership, but merely sets forth where our ships would be working. What the McCloskey amendment prevents is the staking out of any mining claim to a particular area.

Mr. BREAUX. We agree on that. We are not staking out a claim because we do not want to say, "This is where we are going to be in case you are out in that area. Don't use our area."

Mr. Chairman, that is why I think the amendment should be defeated.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment and to impress upon each and every Member the importance of fully understanding what we are doing here today. We must be aware that our actions today will have an impact far beyond the Halls of Congress and will truly reveal just how seriously the United States takes its professed claim to be a responsible member of the international community.

It seems to me that what we are doing now is passing legislation that affects our relationship with all of the world. Rightly or wrongly, the international community has agreed in a U.N. declaration, which was passed without a dissenting vote and with U.S. support, that: "The area shall not be subject to appropriation by any means, by states or persons." Yet, we are addressing here the issue of how to license private mining companies to go out and take those minerals from the ocean floor which we have agreed do not belong to any one nation and are the "common heritage of mankind."

Mr. Chairman, the previous speaker said that everyone agrees we are not asserting ownership. I ask, if we are authorizing people to go ahead and exploit deep sea minerals, is that not asserting de facto ownership of something we have already agreed is not ours to take? Mr. Chairman, I urge support for the McCloskey amendment, and I hope that the Members will look at what we are doing with this legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, as I indicated before, I am in favor of the amendment. However, I do not think we should overestimate the importance of it.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) for a moment because I do not think he wants his words to be interpreted to mean that if this amendment is defeated—and we use the word "area" in the legislation—that the United States will then be saying we have staked out this area and no other country has a right to come in and mine in this area.

I assume the gentleman is not asserting any such thing. If that were so, I think there would be a very serious problem with the entire legislation.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman and I are in complete agreement that the license given by the Department of Commerce would not be a claim of ownership of any area. There is no question about that in this particular matter.

Mr. BINGHAM. In that case, I am a little puzzled as to the gentleman's opposition to the amendment because it seems to me that we are talking about a difference in terminology. I do not see any real difference in substance between the gentleman's position and the position of the gentleman from California (Mr. MCCLOSKEY). The gentleman suggested that the words "work plan" would make the bill more acceptable to the negotiators at the conference. That position has been sustained by the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN); and if we are just talking about a matter of terminology, why cannot the gentleman go along with that?

Mr. BREAUX. If the gentleman will yield further, there is a very major difference. The work plan is between the company and the department. No one else knows about it.

When the department gives a license, it is for an area and puts everyone on notice that this is an area which the United States does not own, but is operating in and will be doing work in. Therefore, we will be exercising reasonable use of the high seas in that area.

That is the major difference, and it is a very important difference.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from California (Mr. MCCLOSKEY), then, whether it is correct that under his amendment the work plan would be a private document between the U.S. Government and the company concerned?

Mr. MCCLOSKEY. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, no; the work plan would be made available if the Secretary of Commerce or the Secretary of the Interior wanted to make it available, and there is no reason that the work plan necessarily would be secret.

Mr. BINGHAM. I personally presume that such a work plan would be a public document. If it were not to be a public document, I would be concerned about it.

Mr. MCCLOSKEY. I see no reason to contend under the amendment that it would be a private document.

Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, with respect to the representations of my good friend from Iowa on the present legal posture of the United States of America with regard to its commitment on the mineral resources, the gentleman quotes from United Nations General Assembly, 25th session, agenda 25, and from paragraph 2 on page 1, as follows:

> The area shall not be subject to appropriation, and no state shall claim or exercise sovereignty or sovereign rights over any part thereof.

But, I know it is not the intention of the gentleman to mislead this body into thinking that that was the sole declaration and commitment of our Nation within this particular document, because this document goes on to say that all of these commitments are contingent upon a condition subsequent; that is, that there will be a Law of the Sea Treaty. The foregoing quote was one sentence in four or five pages. I can cite several quotes to the contrary, I think it is grossly misleading to suggest that that was the sole commitment of the United States on that day.

What the United States said was, as a condition to our entering into an international agreement we make these declarations. The United States did not make an isolated commitment irrespective of any other considerations. It said, "Because we want a Law of the Sea Treaty, this is our commitment in that regard."

For a period in excess of 10 years the Law of the Sea negotiations has proven almost totally nonproductive as we all appreciate and recognize. Therefore, the treaty aspiration has never been realized.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANTINI. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is another reference in that declaration, which reads:

> On the basis of the principles of this Declaration, an international regime applying to the area and its resources and including appropriate international machinery to give effect to its provisions shall be established by an international treaty of a universal character, generally agreed upon.

Of course, that is part of what we are trying to do, but in no way, as I read it, does it delete the obligation which is there for all the parties under title II of that declaration. If the gentleman has something otherwise, I think he should read it.

Mr. SANTINI. Paragraph 3, "Resources incompatible with the international regime to be established"—it contemplates the establishment of an international regime.

Paragraph 5, "The area shall be open to use exclusively for peaceful purposes * * *"

Paragraph 9, "On the basis of the principles of this Declaration * * * established by an international treaty of universal character * * *"

All of these thoughts were composite thoughts; they anticipated the execution at a later time of a treaty, and not a unilateral commitment on our part. Again that commitment was a precursor of a hoped-for treaty.

Mr. BEDELL. If the gentleman will yield further, if a treaty is not negotiated, does the gentleman think then that this means that we then have a perfect right to violate the spirit and letter of the 1970 U.N. Declaration?

Mr. SANTINI. I do not think there is any question under international law today that we could proceed to recover the mineral resources that exist in manganese nodules if we wanted to. We have been delaying both exploration and recovery in the state of apprehension and expectation that one day we were going to enter into some kind of international accord that would be an implementation of this United Nations expression.

Mr. BEDELL. Certainly, from the people that I have talked to, including people involved in these negotiations, I do feel very, very strongly that, as of today, the world feeling is that international law is against our being able to do this, and would say that it is wrong for us to do this. If the gentleman wants me to get further confirmation of that, I will be glad to do so.

Mr. SANTINI. If I may reclaim my time, that is not the opinion of Ambassador Richardson, as he acknowledged in our Interior hearing, when he conceded the fact that we have a legal right to explore and mine. Your conclusion is the opinion of the emerging and Third World nations. That is not the opinion of the United States of America.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise to ask a few questions of the author of the amendment.

I think the gentleman from Nevada is generally correct about the provisions of this bill not being intended to stake out a right as against an international agreement, and I think that is clear under section 202. But section 202, it seems to me, merely says that we will attempt to protect to the extent that we may do so under international law activities by our nationals, acting under the processes of this bill, in the deep sea.

It does not say that we will protect any particular area staked out by a commercial company operating in the deep sea. And it would seem to me that all the gentleman's amendments do is to stress the fact that we are addressing a work plan for an activity rather than a staked out licensed area.

I rather agree with the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) that there may not be all this difference as between the original language of the act and the gentleman's amendment, but it does seem to me his amendment is much more consistent with section 202 in addressing protection of an activity rather than protection of a staked out territory.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is precisely correct.

What we have done in my amendment is strike out two sections on page 12 that refer to the word "area," so that when licensee got his permit, it would not be construed as a claim of U.S. jurisdiction over that area. Our purpose is that neither those in the United States nor anyone in the outside would infer that the United States is granting any right to the area itself. By striking the word "area" and inserting the work plan mechanism we have a far different thing. It is a right granted in personam to an individual; it is not a right to the territory itself.

If I might take this occasion to correct an earlier answer I made in response to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM), when he asked me would this be a public document and I said I saw no reason to believe it would be a private document, I would like to correct that statement, because this will be a public document subject to the Freedom of Information Act. The reservations in the Freedom of Information Act, however, provide that proprietary trade secrets will be protected. To that extent the holder of the application will be required to protect the proprietary aspects, say the application of technology if that would be a valid proprietary trade secret. The Freedom of Information Act would apply, but the trade secrets provision of the Freedom of Information Act would also apply.

Mr. ECKHARDT. I thank the gentleman for his explanation.

I would like to explore this a bit more with him at this time. What we may do, if we do not emphasize the essential activity as opposed to the area, is to invite conflicts where such invitation is not necessary. It is conceivable to me that explorers and exploiters of various countries could be operating simultaneously within a given area without necessarily unduly interfering with each other. And it would seem to me that to use the term "area" and to protect it by a license and then call upon the United States to protect the area as against any other contender might invite a contest which is totally unnecessary. Would the gentleman comment?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. The gentleman from Texas has precisely stated the problem. The areas that were discussed in the testimony and are understood in the international negotiations as the minimum area to permit commercial deep seabed mining would be 40 kilometers square. In the 40-square-kilometer square, the mining operation might be conducted by a single ship on the surface within that 40-square-kilometer area, moving at a pace of 1 kilometer per hour in a relatively small space at any given time. There is no need to protect the entire area and to invite this controversy.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I would first rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY), because I believe that it makes this particular piece of legislation a little more palatable.

I would like to take this opportunity to characterize this legislation as a horrible piece of legislation that reflects our arrogance in the international arena. I would like to place this legislation within what I believe to be its proper context by first reading to you a few words that characterize the history of this legislation:

> Legislation to permit deep sea mining has been introduced each Congress since 1971 but previous administrations have opposed it—

Interestingly enough, Republican administrations, as well—> preferring to settle the issue through an International Law of the Sea Treaty. Because the Law of the Sea Conference appears deadlocked for the near future—the seventh session in March met and adjourned without resolution—the Carter Administration—

A Democratic administration with all of its globalistic statements, are saying that they support "interim legislation to permit exploration and commercial recovery prior to completion of the Law of the Sea Conference."

My point is this: I am shocked and chagrined that the Carter administration, that purports to talk about the rest of the world, cannot do what Republican administrations since 1971 were prepared to do and that is to solve this question within the framework of the international arena.

It is incredibly arrogant that we can stand here in the well of the House and argue with a straight face and say, "No, we do not own or have ocean rights to the sea, but we will rip you off anyway while you are trying to negotiate how we will equitably distribute these resources."

That is like telling me, "All right, you are on your own, but I am going to rip you off anyway while we negotiate the nature of our relationship."

I would suggest this, that once these international corporations begin to mine deep in the ocean, once these international groups began to have a disproportionate power and an impact and an influence on the development of the oceans, both domestic and international, how are you going to get them out? Where will be the impetus for debate, where will be the impetus for high motivation to achieve an international agreement when you already have an economic market that will allow us in a superior fashion to take away the resources of the sea?

Which then leads me to this second statement, and, with your permission, I will read it:

> While the U.S. supports the 1970 United Nations declaration that the resources of the seabed and ocean floor belong to all mankind, it also maintains that deep seabed mining constitutes a freedom of the high seas accorded by the 1958 Geneva Convention on the High Seas.

What is the interpretation of that? That the United States stands in the world community in the incredible principle that the resources of the sea belong to all humankind but in the interim we will find whatever rationale we can that will allow us to go forward and exploit the resources of the sea.

I would make the further point:

We have, with our powerful Nation, joining with other powerful industrial nations, raped and plundered the resources of the surface of the Earth. We are now rapidly coming to the moment when we are running out of those resources on the surface of the Earth. There is one more place in the deep sea.

From what we hear we understand that there are roughly 3 trillion dollars worth of resources.

We now have the prime opportunity to negotiate a treaty that will begin to close the gap between the nations that are nations with great wealth, and the nations with great poverty, the have and the have not nations that have created conflict and confusion from time immemorial. Here is now our opportunity for our Nation to stand in the international arena and be committed to the high principle that we must distribute the resources of the sea to all humankind.

What about the nation of Nigeria in this situation that is a land-locked nation? If we take it upon ourselves to exploit the resources of the sea at this time, what will come of our commitment to the principle of their distribution to the rest of the world—particularly the poor nations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, we know one thing, with respect to the impetus for this legislation. That we are one of the few, if not the only nation in the world that has developed the ability to mine in the deep sea efficiently and effectively. So what we are saying to the rest of the world is, "To hell with you. While we are waiting to negotiate, we are committed to it, but in the interim we will rip off the ocean in our own self-interests."

I consider that arrogance. I consider that blatant arrogance in the international arena. You cannot stand on the principle of world integrity and then decide as a nation that based on your narrowly focused self-interest you will exploit the world. We take this legislation and turn over the ocean to multinational corporations that will rip off the sea the same way that they ripped off underdeveloped nations of the world.

This is a prime moment to reject the absurdity of this legislation and stand on the principle that this is a moment when we can strike a blow to reduce the tensions in the world, to reduce the gap, the tremendous economic gap, between third and fourth world countries and powerful industrial nations of the world.

I find it incredible that we would bring this legislation to the floor backed by a Democratic President, when Republican Presidents that I opposed tremendously had the integrity to see the need to resolve this problem in the international arena. I find it shameful. I think the world would look at this legislation as America backing off of its commitment and responsibility in the international arena. We cannot on the one hand stand on the principle that the resources of the ocean belong to humankind and then say, until we negotiate the specifics of it, we are going to rip you off because we have the technology, capacity, and the economic resources to do it.

I am horrified and shocked that we would bring this legislation to the floor of Congress. I support the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague because it tries to bring some control to a potentially uncontrollable situation. It tries to bring some justice to a totally unjust situation. I would urge all of my colleagues, if they really believe in reducing tensions in the world, if they are committed to the concept of justice and equity, they will strike down this legislation on the ground that they will not be involved in a blatant degree of international arrogance that I think this bill speaks to.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

If I understand my colleague correctly, then what he is saying is he will support the amendment by the gentleman from California?

Mr. DELLUMS. That is correct.

Mr. SKUBITZ. But his real feeling is that there is no critical need at this particular moment for the minerals that lie in the seabed, and that he feels that we ought to enter into an international agreement before we take any step with regards to development; is this correct?

Mr. DELLUMS. The gentleman states my case perfectly. I do not see the urgency, and that is why I believe that this piece of legislation is the wrong piece of legislation at the wrong time. I do not think we need it. All we are doing is providing major corporations with the opportunity to make a jump.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. SANTINI, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Nevada.

Mr. SANTINI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman has indicated there is no need. Would the gentleman identify the minerals that are involved in the subject matter of the deep sea mining legislation?

Mr. DELLUMS. Look, the gentleman does not have to take me to school. This is not my college training. We both know what minerals we are speaking of.

Mr. SANTINI. If the gentleman is going to presume to say there is no need, then I think he must be presumed to know.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I take back my time. I will yield to the gentlemen if he respects the integrity of my opinion and respects me.

Mr. SANTINI. I am coming back to the basic question· What are the minerals that are involved in the question of whether or not there is a need or not a need?

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think the amendment stands on its own ground that the minerals are nickel, copper, and cobalt. Copper has sunk to new heights. That is one of the great problems in our own country. Nickel will be needed in years to come, and so will cobalt. But I share the opinion of the gentleman in the well that there is no urgency for the development of these minerals. I hope an amendment will be adopted at a later time that will postpone the effective day of this until 1985. But I would hate to see debate on this particular amendment get going on that kind of question.

Mr. DELLUMS. I am prepared for this legislation. I do not have to play this kind of game in naming the minerals. Iron, magnesium, nickel, copper, cobalt—I can do that. This is not a third-grade lesson. We are talking about ideals and concepts. I understand all of that, but what I am saying to the Members is that it is a matter of judgment. I respectfully dissent from the judgment of the gentleman from Nevada. I do not see the urgency at this point, even if he disagrees.

I am saying we are living in a world that is becoming increasingly interdependent and interrelated. We have got to be a nation that embraces a world community and realize that here is an opportunity to do just that.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I think we must address ourselves to arrogance at this point and also the need and necessity for this legislation coming to the floor, with the agreement and support of three committees of the House. Legislation has already passed the Senate in previous Congresses, so, obviously, with that type of legislative background there is obviously a great need. Perhaps we may just have to reassess that need and trace back a bit, the history as to why we are here today and as to how we got here.

The Law of the Sea Conference is entering into its second decade of progress. We see the United States and other nations in good faith going to consider many of the issues involved in the sea.

There has been one committee, the Committee on Deep Seabed Resources, that has not made progress, despite the United States at session after session making concession after concession on the question of deep seabed resources.

We went to Caracas, to Geneva, to New York, back to Geneva, back to New York again, and at each one of these sessions we found the United States in a most reasonable area and in the most reasonable way trying to have some access to the deep ocean seabed and its resources. As we debated this issue time and time again in this particular committee, a very distinguished Norwegian diplomat named Jens Evensen was given the task of drawing together a regime, a regime that was just referred to in the great debate between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Nevada. That regime was supposed to control what happened in the deep seabed; but over the years of the Law of the Sea Treaty that regime was so controlled by Third World nations—or the group 77 nations—that these nations are now the ones that control the very mineral resources we are talking about today. Those nations want to control the deep seabed also. They do not want to give the United States or any other industrialized country with the technology, the ability and the need, and also with just as much right to the deep seabed as any other nation the ability to do so. They want to exclude them from mining sites. exclude them from price considerations and exclude them from production controls.

In New York a year ago Elliot Richardson, our ambassador, in full and good faith had tried to get an agreeable regime where there was some parallelism, where the United States could also go parallel with a regime to the deep ocean, so that we could use our technology and meet a need that not only the United States has, but also that the world has. We found as that session drew to a close that the Evensen text was rejected and out from under the table with no consultation and the Paul Engo text was injected. They moved from that reasonable regime and their arrogance at that time was driven home to the United States of America. Ambassador Richardson told the Merchant Marine Committee that the United States was "denied due process" by the leadership of the group 77, that is arrogance.

I think our President and the previous administration supported it and I supported it and most of the Members of this body supported it and that is a reasonable approach to the exploitation of the deep seabed, a use for all of mankind.

In this legislation we clearly say that when the United Nations Law of the Sea Treaty is reasonable enough so that it can be ratified by the Congress, when those provisions prevail, this legislation will be moot.

We also say at the same time that during that interim period, and we will come to the debate on this later, during that interim period we will share part of the profit, if any, from the deep seabed with the Third World.

But I do not think we can be closed out by the arrogance of those countries that want to create another OPEC, another cartel on cooper or manganese, which is vital to the steel producers of this country, or on zinc or nickel and the other rare metals. I think we are being totally reasonable, and the arrogance I see is the arrogance of the law of the sea cabal, the members of which think they can control this situation and extort this country without considering the needs and the necessities of the United States and other industrial countries of the world. They want to keep control. They want to keep control over prices, and they want to keep production control for their own benefit and they do it with pious statements about "the common heritage of mankind" and the like. We are all for the common heritage of mankind—it is in our bill—but it is time we faced the fact they—the group 77—are motivated by a desire to set up a powerful cartel.

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I only wish to say this: When we talk about a reasonable treaty, let me say that we have heard from the chairman of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs and from the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on International Relations, and they urge our support in favor of this amendment.

The other committee chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY), has been successful in obtaining the jurisdiction of this bill for the Commerce Department. I just want to remind the committee that the Secretary of Commerce favors this amendment, and when we talk about reasonableness as opposed to arrogance, the Secretary of Commerce feels that the most reasonable way to administer this bill will be through the work plan concept, and he so testified before the House.

I would hate to see this amendment lost on a question of rhetoric and on a question of charges of arrogance or on the clashes that many inflame us on different issues.

The basic fact of the matter is that two of the three committees that considered this matter favor the work plan concept. The Department of Commerce, the administration's agency that we have just selected by the will of the House to administer it, wants this amendment passed, as does the administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. McCLOSKEY).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McCLOSKEY) there were—ayes 31, noes 28.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 199, noes 202, not voting 31, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY OF NEW YORK

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY of New York: At page 13, line 4, insert a period after the word "States" and delete all that follows through line 5.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would require that entities seeking a permit to mine the deep seabed under the authority of this act document their mining and processing vessels in the United States, not in foreign nations. This requirement is inextricably related to the purposes of this act, which are:

First, to encourage and regulate the development of hard mineral resources from the deep ocean floor. The United States only has the authority to regulate its own flag vessels.

Second, to insure that development of the resources is carried out in a manner that will protect the quality of the environment. Only the United States has the effective ability to insure that its own nationals working on its own flag vessels operate in an environmentally responsible manner.

Third, to permit the continued development of the necessary technology for the expeditious development of hard mineral resources from the seabed. Much of the technology involved in ocean mining is part of, or present on, the mining vessels. Unless the mining vessels are documented in the United States, the technology will be exported free of charge.

Restricting the operations of U.S. permittees to U.S.-flag mining and processing vessels would accomplish crucially important objectives.

In recent months, U.S. citizens have begun to revolt against the heavy individual tax burdens they bear. I, for one, do not want to be among those responsible for exporting millions of dollars in tax revenues, thousands of American jobs, and the mining technology that Americans have spent millions to develop.

If U.S. permittees are required to document their mining vessels in the United States, all of the tax dollars resulting from U.S.-flag vessel operations will accrue to the U.S. Treasury and hundreds of new American jobs will be created thus reducing the burden on the individual taxpayer. The ocean mining technology developed with the support of U.S. tax dollars will remain under American control.

The legislation clearly recognizes that deep seabed mining is a freedom of the high seas, subject to a duty of reasonable regard to the interests of other States. There is real concern among Americans about the possible adverse impact which deep seabed mining may have on the environment. These impacts are, at this point, largely unpredictable. Nobody can determine what the actual impacts will be until a substantial amount of evidence is accumulated from actual exploration and commercial recovery activities.

By enacting this legislation, which encourages U.S. nationals to develop the capacity to mine the mineral resources of the deep seabed, the United States incurs an obligation to other nations to carry out these activities in an environmentally responsible manner. This is only possible if the United States has the authority to control the activities of those to whom it issues permits. America can only control the design and operation of American-documented vessels. Furthermore, the United States can only assuredly place its scientists and environmental experts on board its own vessels. If the mining vessels are not U.S.-flag vessels, there is no assurance that we will be able to collect the data we need to assess the environmental impact of deep seabed mining operations.

There are persuasive environmental, safety, manning, and crew-training benefits which will come from this amendment and I urge its enactment.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) because it seems to me that the amendment would assure that these very high technology ships developed by us would be available to us whenever and wherever they were needed. It would also insure, in large measure, that the deep seabed mining technology would not be available to other countries except under appropriate circumstances. So it does assure us the protection of this technology built into these deep seabed vessels.

I think the amendment is a good amendment.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, I will be brief. I will not take 5 minutes.

We have heard a living voice speaking to us in the words of 1903. America has not talked like this for years. We are trying to live in a different world. We must live in a different world. We are being required to live in a world in which we all share to some extent. We cannot go on like this, arrogating to ourselves powers that we do not have, simply because we have money. We are not going to be able to live in a world in which people act on these principles and standards. I do not think we have heard talk like this for a long, long time.

We have listened to past administrations, trying to bring into being and to encourage some kind of orderly world. How is it that we hear these voices now? What accounts for it? How can it be that we have turned our backs on the slow, painful development of people on this planet trying to live together in some kind of decency and respect, one for the other?

Everything is not money; we know that. We cannot live alone. There is no vacuum into which we can retire.

Mr. Chairman, I urge defeat of this amendment. I think it would be a defeat for the United States and for the honor of this country if it were to be adopted.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise to speak in favor of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is always difficult for me to take the floor after the distinguished gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK), and generally I agree with the proposition that the resources of the world and the opportunities of the world should be divided most equally. But do not believe for a moment that a Liberian ship is the result of a slow and painful development of Liberia. A Liberian ship is the result of the registry in the city of New York, typically by an oil company, of that ship as Liberian in order that the ship avoid certain requirements respecting safety of operations, wages, and the like, applicable to U.S. ships. Look at these Liberian ships: For instance, the Amoco Cadiz. Do the Members remember when that ship ruptured? The Argo Merchant—do the Members remember when that ship's hull burst and leaked oil over the sea? The Sansinena—a Liberian ship. The Torrey Canyon—everyone remembers the Torrey Canyon.

How long are we going to permit this fakery of flag of convenience? We have a Panamanian ship with an Italian master and a Spanish crew, belonging to a U.S. oil compnay. What kind of development of small nations does this promote? What control do we have over such ships?

In truth what we should do is outlaw this fakery of ships registered under a flag of convenience. That is what we really ought to do, and that is what one day we are going to have to do. But this is a small movement in that direction.

I strongly urge the passage of the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should understand what the language does that the gentltman's amendment would seek to strike. I think the gentleman from Texas who just spoke misunderstands the effect of the bill. As recommended by the Committee on International Relations and the Committee on the Interior—and on this point we are not in agreement with the members of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries—the bill provides that the vessels may be documented under the laws of the United States or the laws of a reciprocating state. If the gentleman will look at section 107 of the bill. that has to do with the definition of "reciprocating states."

Those will be the states which regulate deep seabed mining in a manner compatible with the United States, and with whom we expect to cooperate. We are asking for their cooperation in the mining. The consortia that will be operating these concerns will be international consortia, but under the gentleman's amendment we will be saying that, "We want to cooperate with you in every respect, except we are not going to allow any of your ships to do any of this."

Let us be clear, this amendment is opposed by the Committee on International Relations. It is opposed by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs. It is opposed by the administration. It is opposed by the mining industry. It is opposed by the environmentalists. The only people affected by the bill that favor this amendment are the shipping industry.

The amendment would sacrifice, in my judgment, the purposes of the bill and the interests of all the major concerned parties to the desires of this one group.

Let us be clear about who will be doing the mining under this bill. The mining will be done by multinational mining consortia with partners not only in this country, but in Belgium, Canada, France, Japan, the United Kingdom, or West Germany.

Presumably our companies enter into these consortia because they want others to share the burden of providing the capital and the technology for these extremely costly and complex ventures.

Are we going to turn around and say to these other countries that they can share those burdens, but only our ships can be used because we want to reserve these particular projects for our shipping industry? I cannot think of a better way to break up the consortia. Such a breakup would be a serious blow to the mining operations in which we are interested.

The proponents of the amendment say it will save the United States jobs. Do not believe it. They talk about the jobs gained for the shipping industry, but they do not tell you about the jobs that will be lost when mining consortia register in other countries to avoid the increased mining costs imposed by this amendment. If we want to drive the deep sea mining industry out of this country, this amendment is the way to do it.

The proponents of this amendment raise the specter of a lot of ships flying flags of convenience, using cheap labor and undercutting our environmental regulations. This is where the gentleman from Texas who preceded me in the well is misled about the effect of the bill. This is a misrepresentation of the provisions of the bill which, as I said, limits the mining and processing vessels to those of the United States or a reciprocating state. By definition, a reciprocating state is another advanced industrial nation which regulates its ocean mining ventures in a manner similar to ours, including regulations protecting the ocean environment. There will be very few reciprocating states, and certainly no wholesale export of jobs.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues who really want to encourage deep seabed mining to reject this amendment.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from New York on his statement. I concur completely with everything the gentleman says and I want to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to congratulate the gentleman from New York and I want to raise this question. Is there any probability or likelihood that either Liberia or Panama would be one of the reciprocating states?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think there is no likelihood whatsoever of that.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief to the members of the Committee. What the amendment of the chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) says, very simply, is that any mining or processing ship that is going to be working in deep seabed mining under a U.S. license has to be documented in the United States. That does not mean it has to be built in the United States. It means it has to fly the flag of the country which is issuing the license for them to do the mining.

There are a lot of arguments why it is necessary for jobs and to encourage U.S. ships.

But there is a whole additional set of reasons why the gentleman's amendment should be adopted. For instance, there are a number of environmental laws, very strong environmental laws, and standards involved. These are U.S. laws, and those laws are not going to apply to ships of a foreign country; they are going to apply to a U.S.-documented vessel.

This also means that certain safety regulations would be followed by ships that would be operating on the high seas, because our U.S. laws would then be applied to those ships. This work would be done by a U.S.-documented ship under the Murphy amendment; it would be done by a U.S.-flag ship.

In addition to that, the ships would be manned by U.S. merchant seamen who are trained in the trade and licensed by the Coast Guard. They are seamen who are capable of manning that type of vessel, and they are going to be the type of crew that should run those kinds of vessels.

I am not worried about any foreign country saying, "Well, if you are going to make this rule, we aren't going to come and get a license from you."

Where else are they going to go to get a license? For some time to come, there is no other country in the world that has a licensing procedure that would apply if we pass this legislation today.

They are not interested so much in having a Soviet ship or a French ship. What they are interested in doing is getting the minerals, and they are going to get the minerals under the Murphy amendment. They are going to get them by the operation of a U.S.-documented vessel, but they want the minerals, not the ships.

Mr. Chairman, if we are going to apply a licensing procedure and put U.S. prestige on the line, our U.S. ships ought to be able to share in the benefits. I do not believe we are asking too much in saying that these ships should be U.S.-flag ships.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to join with my colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), in support of this amendment.

This is the amendment to which I made reference earlier. I think it is a very useful and constructive amendment, and I urge its adoption.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) had referred to what ships could be qualified. The ship does not have to be a ship of a nation which is actually operating in the deep sea mining consortium as I understand it. It merely has to be a reciprocating nation which regulates in the manner provided in this act.

Therefore, it could be any nation, as I understand it, whether that nation is actually working the deep seabed or not. It merely has to recognize the same standards as those nations do that are operating in the deep sea.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman's argument. It is very important to note that the vessel does not have to be built in the United States; however, once registered in the United States, this high-technology ship cannot be transferred to another foreign government without the approval of the U.S. Government.

That means that we have by virtue of this amendment a very tight control over the technology embodied in deep seabed mining.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentlewoman from Louisiana.

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment, and I would like to join with my colleague, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), particularly in his concerns expressed about the environmental quality that we could expect only through this amendment.

We have to recognize that we really cannot put our scientists or our environmentalists aboard any other ships but American ships. I do feel that we owe it to other nations to make certain that we have all the data that could possibly accrue to us from having American scientists and American environmentalists aboard these ships monitoring and being able to report not only to the United States but to other participating nations.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) made one statement during the discussion that bothers me, and it has bothered me about this whole piece of legislation.

The gentleman made the statement that no other industry or mining company can go to any other country for a license. The fact is that they cannot go to this country for a license yet; is that correct?

Mr. BREAUX. Well, they would be able to after we pass this legislation.

Mr. VOLKMER. But not without this legislation?

Mr. BREAUX. Not without this legislation.

Mr. VOLKMER. Can the gentleman then assure this House that no other country right now is contemplating doing the very same things we are attempting to do?

Mr. BREAUX. There are several countries contemplating doing the same thing, but all of them are waiting for us.

Mr. VOLKMER. That means that if we go ahead, in all probability they will also go ahead, but then what we will have is disagreements as to areas concerned. Does the gentleman disagree with that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) has expired.

Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. And I rise in support of the amendment and in support of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, the greatest natural resource on this Earth is the sea. The sea nurtures, cleanses and renews life. And from the great depths of the oceans, we may find answers to many of the material problems that beset our troubled planet. For that reason, I strongly urge the passage of H.R. 3350, The Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act.

The passage of this bill is critical to the economic health, welfare, and prosperity of this Nation. More immediately, it will relieve us of pressing strategic anxieties.

The enemies of this Republic know very well that the weakest link in an otherwise strong economic chain that binds the industrial nations of the West is our extraordinary dependence on imported raw materials. It is no surprise to anyone familiar with this critical weakness that the Cuban and Soviet energies are directed toward capturing strategically critical real estate, bordering the sealanes: the Horn of Africa, the western coast of Angola, astride the South Sea passages to America and Europe. It is no wonder that the Soviet Union has deployed a "blue water naval force" threatening those sealanes, so vital to the economic life of the industrialized nations of the West and Japan. For here, along these critical passages, the bulk of raw materials bound for the ports of the West are shipped.

It was just a few short years ago that the Western World was shocked into the awful reality of its dependence on Third World resources. When the OPEC nations imposed their embargo on oil, we found ourselves presented with an unprecedented crisis. These states, largely run by backward or hostile political regimes, doubled, then quadrupled the international price of oil between 1971 and 1974. This 400-percent increase in oil prices had a severe impact on balance-of-payments deficits in both the developed and underdeveloped countries of the world. In the United States and the industrialized nations of the West the oil deficit alone reached $40 billion. It served to aggravate a dangerous national and international inflation, created unprecedented problems for the international monetary systems, and forced further slowdowns in the already fragile industrialized economies of the United States, Western Europe, and Japan.

Mr. Chairman, that should have been lesson enough. We cannot afford a repeat of that situation with minerals critical to our industrial survival. We must take decisive steps to insure that we are not at the mercy of other cartels or concerted efforts by Third World adversaries, encouraged by the Soviet Union, a la the oil embago, to bring the economies of the United States and other Western states to a grinding halt.

We have the liberty and the luxury of preparation now. We must act now.

The United States is the single largest consumer of these critical minerals. And the entire economy of the Republic is dependent upon access to them. At the present time we import them at rates which are too high for comfort or security. This is especially true of such metals as nickel, copper, cobalt, and manganese.

We are not now, nor are we likely to be, in the fortunate position of the Soviet Union. Estimates and projections vary. But the Soviet Union is generally believed to be virtually self-sufficient in these industrial raw materials. Leviathan has not yet the technological capability of extracting them at a rate that would satisfy its appetite for industrial power. But the Kremlin's domestic cup of raw materials does runneth over.

Mr. Chairman, providence has blessed us with great abundance. But in this particular area—on land—we are impoverished. We must turn to the sea. The sea is the Earth's last great frontier. Untold riches abound on the ocean floor. In the face of possible resource scarcities, blackmail, or international economic instability, we may resort to this bastion of fantastic natural wealth.

Oceanographers and geologists have told us of the riches of the sea. We know that certain areas of the seabed are suffused with these valuable minerals. Consider the potential. In an essay published in the International Law Quarterly, volume 20, April 1971, it is reported that:

> One square mile of seabed may be covered with 70,000 tons of nodules containing 30,000 tons of manganese, 3,600 tons of aluminum, 2,300 tons of cadmium, 17,000 tons of iron, 400 tons of cobalt, 1,200 tons of nickel and 650 tons of copper.

And I would remind you, Mr. Chairman, that these minerals are not the only treasures to be extracted from the depths of the oceans. The treasures are immense. The Japanese are currently farming kelp, and in my native State of California we, too, are experimenting with this resource. Seabed monitoring devices offer great possibilities to advance deep sea fish farming. We may be in the first phase of harvesting a food supply that would help to feed the expanding population of this world. We must be sure that we do not subscribe to international agreements in this area that would, in fact, retard rather than encourage these developments.

The technology for mining the seas is developing rapidly. For example, in 1963 the Marine Diamond Corp. of Capetown, South Africa, managed to extract 51,000 carats of rough diamonds from the seabed. U.S. industry sources indicated that by 1990 we could substantially cut our imports of these vital minerals, especially manganese and cobalt. According to the Ocean Resources Department of the Kennecott Copper Co., we import 98 percent of our cobalt. Conceivably, we could be self-sufficient in this valuable mineral by 1990 if we quickly resort to ocean mining. We could achieve 90 percent sufficiency in copper and 70 percent sufficiency in primary nickel by 1990. By the year 2000, we could achieve a surplus in cobalt, manganese, and primary nickel.

In developing this new source of supply, we would not only be protecting ourselves from cartel blackmail or international economic warfare, we would also insure the growth of a desperately needed new industry, stimulating the rate of investment and expanding employment opportunities for our people. But we must forge ahead now. It is estimated that private firms are willing to invest as much as $2.8 billion into this project by 1980 and assure a full scale commercialization of these resources by 1983. Private entrepreneurs have the technology to forge ahead and they have the will to accomplish the task. But we cannot allow an inhospitable environment to smother the most optimistic prospects for ocean mining. We cannot subscribe to any new regime of international law which would inhibit this vital investment.

Mr. Chairman, the Law of the Sea is now (de lege ferenda) in the process of development. There is a great need to insure that the legitimate interests of all nations are protected in the development of international law, as it applies to this immensely complex area. I recognize that we must fashion an international law that will effectively grapple with the problems of pollution, waste, and national sovereignty. But in the process of drafting new treaties and conventions, we must not deviate from America's historical commitment to the freedom of the seas. Our rights, and the rights of any other nation to mine the resources of the oceans, are integral to that longstanding American doctrine. We cannot allow ourselves to be locked into any future agreements that would preclude our legitimate access to the fruits of the oceans.

It is we who have the will. the technology, the managerial and engineering skills to accomplish this task. No other nation possesses the same degree of ingenuity in this area. We ought not to succumb to some guilt-ridden rhetoric which would foreclose the effective development of these resources. In any case, we cannot afford to surrender this traditional freedom of the seas, central to our foreign policy since the founding of this Republic, to some future, probably hostile bureaucracy, staffed by representatives of envious Third World nations. This is what may be ordained by the current United Nations Law or the Sea Conference.

Mr. Chairman, we can afford no delays. Let us press forward with this measure. Please let us consider our posterity.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bad amendment. The administration does not want it; the mining industry does not want it. It is going to create grave problems for them. The amendment is wanted only by the shipping industry.

I share with some of my colleagues in the House some impatience that we have not drive away our partners. It is imwaited on the Law of the Sea all of these years. We have postponed and postponed.

I made up my mind a long time ago we were going to go ahead and create a framework when we could begin to tap the resources in the seabed. The time has come, and we should pass this legislation and get on with it.

It is important to be fair, that we do not drive away our partners. It is important to understand what is happening. These are not American mining companies that are going out by themselves and using American ships. This job is going to be done by international consortia in which several nations will be represented, and they will be, as the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) said, from the wealthier industrial nations.

The report put out by the International Relations Committee shows that there are about five groups poised, getting ready to go to work. The main one is Kennecot, a U.S. company, but it has three partners from Great Britain, a consortium, one from Canada and one from Japan.

The second big one, Ocean Management, Inc., has companies from Canada, Germany, the United States, and Japan, each with 25 percent.

Another one is largely Belgium.

Another one is largely from the Netherlands.

Another one is largely France.

We cannot say to these people, "You are only going to use U.S. ships and U.S. personnel in manning those ships." We will drive them out of the business and we will see that the deep sea mining does not go forward. By doing this I think we make a very big mistake.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I am in disagreement with my colleague in the well. I gather the gentleman is talking about the moms and pops of the international cartels in the world. Those are the wealthiest of all of the business conglomerates in the entire universe.

The amendment offered by the gentleman from New York seeks to redress a very small part of that, to regain a little of what is left of the American maritime industry.

I would like to advise my colleagues—and this will only take 10 seconds—that I had some six major local maritime unions that, because of historical experience, have their own bought-and-paid-for buildings in my district. As a result of the legislation, or lack thereof, in the last 18 months, there will only be three. If we are not careful, we will not have a maritime industry at all in this country, and I think that is nonsense.

I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is a modest one, to keep this industry that is barely alive a little afloat.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, few things would please me more than to see the U.S. shipping industry get up off of its back and be prosperous. But the last way you are going to make any progress is to create a situation where we have four countries, Canada, Germany, the United States, and Japan, each with 25 percent prepared to mine and then say to those proud nations, "No consortium in which a United States company participates can go out there unless all of these ships involved in this enterprise are documented in the United States." It is not right. Other countries will not accept it. We would not put up with it. We should not impose this on other countries. That is why there is opposition to it.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UDALL. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I made it very clear that only one vessel is involved at the mining site for the transportation of these minerals. and we are now talking about the mining process vessel, and none of the other vessels.

I might state further that we have been sharing with the Japanese and with the Germans all of these legislative initiatives. They are just waiting to see what the American Congress does so that they can pattern and model their own national legislation after this. But we are dealing only with that single vessel per site where the United States is involved.

Mr. UDALL. I would make the point that, with all of the thousands of vessels on the ocean, why would we go out and hold up and delay what our minerals industry needs?

I think we make a mistake if we adopt this amendment.

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I speak in opposition to any amendment which would restrict the vessels used in mining, processing, or transporting mineral resources from the ocean floor to only U.S.-flag ships. Section 103 of H.R. 3350 and H.R. 12988 provide that mining and processing ships are to be documented under U.S. laws or under the laws of reciprocating states. Any amendment to restrict deep seabed operations to only U.S.-flag ships would, in effect, be comparable to a 100-percent cargo preference. Last September we debated this issue in connection with H.R. 1037, the oil cargo preference bill, which would have required 9.5 percent of U.S. oil imports to be carried in U.S.-built ships. That measure was defeated but the same concept is now being proposed for deep seabed operations, which could then establish a precedent for extension of cargo preferences for oil or other products.

At the time we debated the oil cargo preference bill I had two main objections, namely the inflationary impact and the implications for U.S. foreign economic policy. Those same objections apply in this case. The higher rates usually charged by U.S.-flag vessels will raise the cost of the deep seabed operations for U.S. firms, making their operations less competitive and presumably consumer prices higher.

I understand that four major U.S. ocean mining companies are organized in consortia with partners in Britain, Canada, Japan, West Germany, or the Netherlands making commercial recovery a multinational enterprise. Ships under contract to U.S. companies as well as under contract to foreign associates will be needed to mine, process, and transport the mineral resources.

Restriction of these operations to U.S.-flag ships would restrict the operations of these consortia and retard the development of ocean mining just at the time in which we are in a crucial final phase of the multilateral trade negotiations in Geneva seeking to liberalize trade barriers in concert with the same countries whose ships would be precluded from use by the consortia under the amendment. Restriction to U.S.-flag ships would be inconsistent with U.S. objectives in those negotiations, would reverse U.S. policy favoring free competition and trade expansion worldwide based on fair and equitable rules, and could trigger the adoption of similar measures by foreign countries in this or other areas.

I understand that the administration opposes the amendment and supports the provision for mining and processing ships to be documented under U.S. laws or under the laws of reciprocating states. I urge my colleagues to do the same.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

The question was taken; and the Chairman being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 38, noes 19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Are there further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MURPHY OF NEW YORK

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MURPHY of New York: At page 13, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

(3) Each permittee shall use at least one vessel documented under the laws of the United States for the transportation from each mining site of hard mineral resources commercially recovered under the permit.

Page 13, line 6, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would require that at least one of the vessels transporting the seabed nodules away from a mining site where companies are operating under a U.S. permit be documented under the laws of the United States.

Each mining system will consist of a mining vessel to harvest the nodules, two or more ore carriers to transport the recovered nodules from the mining sites to land, and a processing plant. Between two and four ore carriers will be needed for each mining site depending on the volume of the mining operation, how far from land the mining site is, and the size of the ore transport vessels.

Requiring each U.S. permittee to utilize at least one U.S.-flag ore carrier per mine site would guarantee U.S. control over the vessels needed to transport at least a significant portion of strategically important hard mineral resources. Without this amendment, U.S. permittees will be able to document all of their mineral transport vessels under flags-of-convenience, and the United States will have no control over the environmental, safety, and manning dimensions of transporting these mineral resources which are vital to the economy and security of the United States.

Since each mining operation will probably require between two and four ore carriers to transport seabed nodules from the mining site to land, this amendment would not impose restrictions on foreign entities belonging to a U.S.-licensed international consortium. At least 50 percent and as much as 75 percent of the ore carriers involved in these operations could be documented under the laws of any foreign nation.

Passage of this amendment will prevent American ocean mining companies from operating their entire bulk fleet under flags-of-convenience at the expense of American labor, tax laws, and environmental and safety standards.

Experts attribute 85 percent of all shipping disasters to human error. Although this factor cannot be completely eliminated, it can be minimized through rigorous training standards for ship personnel, cognizant and concerned with the possibility of damaging the marine environment. Utilization of U.S.-flag ore carriers, designed and operated under the most stringent safety standards and manned by highly skilled and trained U.S. seafaring personnel who must meet Federal Government licensing and certification requirements, will provide the greatest assurance and measure of protection for the marine environment.

The employment of U.S. vessels and U.S. crews will contribute millions of dollars annually to the U.S. Treasury through corporate taxes on shipping profits and income taxes on seamen. Presently, the multinational oil companies escape an estimated $100 million per year in U.S. taxation by registering their vessels under foreign flags and manning them with foreign crews. This amendment will help prevent the U.S. ocean mining industry from becoming another runaway industry.

Every vessel documented under the laws of the United States helps to ease the drain of the dollar and reduce the deficit in our international balance of payments. When U.S. dollars and U.S. crews are paid to transport our mineral resources, dollars are retained in the U.S. economy and used to purchase American goods and services. Dollars paid for foreign shipping leave this country.

This amendment would encourage the growth of the U.S.-flag bulk fleet necessary to end this Nation's dependency on foreign-flag vessels for the carriage of virtually all the strategic minerals imported by this country. Today, not a single ore carrier flies the U.S. flag. Japan controls approximately two-thirds of the world ore carrier fleet and Liberia much of what remains. Almost all of the Liberian-flag fleet is owned by Americans.

The U.S. ocean mining industry has the capacity to reverse the sad state of the U.S.-flag dry bulk fleet. The active U.S. flag dry bulk fleet today consists of only 14 vessels. Most of these vessels are over 25 years old and none of them are ore carriers. Although dry bulk commodities comprise 40 percent of U.S. foreign trade shipments, less than 2 percent moves in U.S.-flag ship.

Unless this legislation requires each U.S. permittee to employ at least one U.S.-flag ore carrier, this Nation will have lost what may be its last opportunity to gain a U.S.-flag dry bulk fleet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MURPHY of New York was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I support the gentleman's amendment. I really wonder why we limit it to one vessel. Our Subcommittee on Government Operations has had hearings that have clearly demonstrated that the Coast Guard cannot look behind the competency certificate that a foreign government issues on a foreign-licensed vessel. Also, we have testimony showing that when the Coast Guard boards a foreign vessel, they find that they are short a mate, shall we say, and that within 2 hours the consul comes down with almost a blank check certificate and gives it to some seaman. The Coast Guard has to accept that at face value.

I would rather see the gentleman's amendment go much farther, because it is just an absolutely undisputed fact that these foreign flag vessels do not meet the safety standards or crew competency of American-flag ships.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. The gentleman states the case well, but the committee in its modesty only recommended one of these vessels. Hopefully, the committee will support that modest request.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I will support the amendment. I hear people who joke about this modest proposition, but I think it is modest also. The record is replete with the lack of safety, lack of environmental protection, lack of competency on the part of foreign-flag vessels. None of the maritime nations throughout the world measure up to the standards of American-flag ships. I think it is obscene that the American taxpayer and those less concerned about the taxpayers should see our money go to subsidize substandard vessels with substandard crews, which are a threat to the environment and safety of the ocean.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I thank my colleague.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

May I suggest very briefly, that of course there is no subsidy involved here, as the gentleman from California has been suggesting.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. They are subsidized through the fact that the American corporations that hire ships under foreign registry avoid paying the taxes they would have to pay if the ships were American-licensed.

Mr. BINGHAM. But the operations we are talking about here are operations in deep seabed mining areas. As we have said before, these will be operated by international consortia. We are talking about advanced nations that would have the same or similar standards as ours. For the reasons given before in relation to the previous amendment, I oppose this amendment.

It is somewhat less objectionable than the previous amendment because it does limit the protection to one American vessel, but I nevertheless object to it.

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. VANIK).

Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out that our Government will have the right to issue licenses, and it could set any standards desired as a condition. It seems to me that would be a far more effective way of dealing with this problem than locking it into the statutory form as suggested by the amendment.

I oppose the amendment. I do not have to defend a record on whether I support American jobs. I think this is a very unfortunate step the Congress would be taking. I certainly hope we can reject this proposal.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the necessary number of words and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, mention has been made of the taxpayers of this country, during course of debate on this amendment, and to the loss of $100 million a year that they experience through the fact that companies license foreign ships or use foreign ships, but I would like to remind this body and the people of this country that the taxpayers are paying handsomely for a maritime industry, to the shippers and to the unions, some $586 million year after year after year, representing 74 percent of the wages and nearly 50 percent of the construction of the ships. And this is not something that just happens once. It is every year.

We know what nearly happened to the consumers of this country had other such proposals put before this Congress not been defeated. We were told by the General Accounting Office that the proposals backed by the same voices would have cost these taxpayers an extra $550 million to $610 million every single year. This is not anything new.

I think we must have regard for the taxpayers, but certainly this is not the way to do it.

Mr. ECKHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment and largely for the same reasons I stated on the last one.

But I would like to have the opportunity here to clarify one thing that the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) has said, because it did throw a question on my arguments with respect to the ships of various registries.

A reciprocatiing state is not necessarily a state whose nationals are in a consortium. A reciprocating state is defined in the bill on page 32 as a state which the President in consultation with the Secretary finds meets certain requirements. These requirements are not engagement in the activity in the deep sea. The requirements are requirements of providing a legal framework for exploration. It does not mean they have to go forth and explore. They have to create a legal framework to do so. It is a state which recognizes licenses and permits issued in this manner and which recognizes, under its procedures, priorities of right for applications for licenses. And the state must regulate the conduct of persons subject to its jurisdiction, and so forth.

And so the state must merely proclaim: "Look, if we engage in deep sea mining we will engage in it in the same way that the United States does," but there is no provision in the bill that states a reciprocating state must be a state in the consortium actually. Engaged in the mining operation.

That is the reason I stated that ships of Liberian or Panamanian registry represented by very competent American lawyers can find ways to qualify even though Panama or Liberia or their nationals may not be engaged in any consortium actually engaged in mining in the deep sea.

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

There has been some comment here about the approximately $500 million spent per annum for the U.S. merchant marine. The point was further made that perhaps we are not getting our money's worth out of that expenditure.

I think that what we have to do is analyze what free competition has done for us in the ore vending carrying business. The Japanese are carrying 80 percent of all of the ore in the world at this time.

What we very wisely did back in the early days of the Republic was to enact the Jones Act that provided that, point-to-point carriage in the United States requires that these ships have got to be American ships, and we have got to use American crews and those ships have got to be built in the United States.

Now, were we not to have the Jones Act today, the Japanese would be carrying 80 percent of all of the cargo between American ports for example, between Seattle and San Francisco and between New York and Philadelphia, and the Russians would probably be carrying the other 20 percent.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEGGETT. I will yield in just a moment.

So what we need to do—what we must do—is to build in certain hedges in favor of the American merchant marine. It has to be in the nature of Jones Act kinds of qualifications and aids. It has to be in the nature of the first Murphy amendment, to provide that at least the ore manufacturing-processing ships be under American flag. For us just to get 25 percent of this new kind of ore-carrying capability we have got to enact this second amendment offered by Chairman MURPHY.

Now I am happy to yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding. I know about the Jones Act. It was mentioned by the chairman of the FTC as one of the causes of unnecessary costs imposed upon American consumers every year. The question is how much longer are we going to go on?

Mr. LEGGETT. Let me say to the gentlewoman who has just asked, "how long we are going to go on?", I would say in reply to her question what does she think would happen if the United States were to be involved in a conventional war with the Soviet Union? It may be, in some future emergency that Japan might be on the side of the Soviet Union. If we were totally dependent on those two countries, the carriage of American cargoes between points in the United States, how could we provide for our national defense?

Mrs. FENWICK. Let me say that we have four operating companies which are not operating under the Maritime Commission and are making money.

Mr. LEGGETT. What kind of cargo are they carrying? They are carrying a very, very limited, isolated type of container cargoes. There are only a few companies that can survive in that kind of an atmosphere.

Mrs. FENWICK. If we could just liberate all our ships and let them operate efficiently maybe they could.

Mr. LEGGETT. The Japanese are liberated today and they have got a large percentage of the ships in the world. A large percentage of all of the keels laid down in the world last year were laid down in Japan.

Mrs. FENWICK. Does the gentleman remember our debate on the floor the last time we were discussing this? What about the requirements that are totally unnecessary, crew requirements that are not needed on that particular kind of ship?

Mr. LEGGETT. It is true that there may be some limitations like that.

Mrs. FENWICK. We heard the testimony in the House that the Coast Guard requires certain safety requirements and that our merchant marine, quite unnecessarily, goes far beyond them. We cannot continue to operate so inefficiently.

Mr. LEGGETT. I know that the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) supports all of the clean air, clean water and clean discharges laws and regulations that apply to the U.S. ships. Now when we are trying to be competitive with the world's maritime industry, you hark back to the Jones Act. You do not like it, and you would like to repeal it.

Mrs. FENWICK. The gentleman brought up the Jones Act, I did not.

Mr. LEGGETT. The gentlewoman is trying to take us back 30 or 40 years ago.

Mrs. FENWICK. We will never be competitive if we have to use larger crews than we need, larger than the Coast Guard says we need.

Mr. LEGGETT. If you would support us for more ships, we could get ahead with the crews and the ships we have got together with the new ships that would be coming on line. Incidentally, in the last 10 years the U.S. maritime industry has cut back the crewing on new U.S. modern vessels by 25 to 35 percent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment by the gentleman from New York, to require that at least one ore carrier per mining site be documented under U.S. laws.

I wholeheartedly supported the gentleman's previous amendment and feel that the one before us is equally important to the well-being of the United States.

The requirement that one ore carrier per mining site be a U.S.-flag vessel could result in various economic benefits to this country. At present, no specialized ore carriers fly the American flag, while Japan controls approximately two-thirds of the existing ore carrier fleet. The use of an American vessel means that the jobs created by this amendment will be reserved for American workers.

In addition, the mineral resources of the deep seabed will play a significant role in maintaining the economic health and security of our Nation in a time of resource scarcity. Restricting seabed mining operations to U.S.-flag vessels will guarantee U.S. control over minerals, such as copper, cobalt, nickel, and manganese, all of which are essential to the industrial economy and national security of America.

By requiring American manning and documentation under U.S. laws, this amendment, in addition to the previous one, could readily enhance the possibility that many vessels are built in U.S. shipyards. This will ameliorate the severity of the projected workload decline in the 27 shipyards throughout the country which compose the total shipbuilding resource base as currently defined by the Maritime Administration.

Our shipbuilding industry is encountering a national mood that has set the building of ships, military or otherwise, at a fairly low priority. According to recent statistics, cited by Shipyard Weekly and other periodicals, the United States may have to shed up to 25 percent of its shipyard work force by the beginning of 1979. Only 5 months ago, the leadership of a major shipyard in Louisiana, was predicting necessary cutbacks of as many as 4,000 in the coming months.

This could amount to an overall national decline in employment of approximately 45,000 persons. This in turn will lead to a direct decline in demand for materials and component parts from all States of the Union. The ripple effect will spread throughout the entire U.S. economy, and with the common multiplier effect of 3 to 1, a 45,000-man decrease in shipyard employment equates to the loss of at least another 135,000 jobs in the private sector.

This must not be allowed to occur.

At a time when millions of Americans are out of work, it is imperative that we make every effort to reserve some of these jobs created by American technology for American workers. The economic benefits of this amendment to the country deserve not only careful consideration, but the full support of this body.

Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment requiring one ore carrier per mining site be documented under the laws of the United States.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I just want to say to the gentleman I concur in his statement. It has been interesting to sit here this afternoon and listen to some of the arguments made. We were told earlier that this bill was a giant ripoff by the multinational corporations that are going to rape and plunder the ocean bottom at the expense of the world. Now on this amendment and the preceding amendment, we are told by those same critics that we have to be so solicitous of the same multinationals who were accused of raping and plundering earlier this afternoon in the debate. If I have to choose between these international business big boys and American workers jobs in shipyards and on ships, the proper choice is very clear to me. I suspect the same persons who are telling us today that we should vote against the Murphy amendment, against our merchant marine and aganst our workers and seamen today, will be back next week saying we ought to tax these same working people in order to finance the multibillion-dollar foreign aid bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I think the gentleman's point is well taken.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding. Is that the gentleman from Maryland speaking?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. KREBS

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. KREBS: Page 31, between lines 23 and 24 insert the following:

(10) CONSERVATION OF NATURAL RESOURCES.—For the purpose of conservation of natural resources, each license and permit shall contain, as needed, terms, conditions, and restrictions which have due regard for the prevention of waste and the future opportunity to commercially recover the unrecovered balance of the hard mineral resources. In establishing these terms, conditions, and restrictions, the Secretary shall consider the state of the technology, the environmental effects of the exploration or commercial recovery activities, economic and resource data, and the national need for hard mineral resources. As used in this Act, the term "conservation of natural resources" is not intended to grant, imply, or create any inference of production controls or price regulation, in particular those which would affect the volume of production, prices, profits, markets, or the decision by which minerals or metals are to be recovered, except as such effects may be incidental to actions taken pursuant to this section.

Page 31, line 24, strike out "(10)" and insert "(11)".

Mr. KREBS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I will be extremely brief.

I believe that this is a rather simple amendment. I do not think there is any question, regardless of which side of this bill you stand on, whether you support it or you are going to oppose it, I think we all want to have the cleanest operation, an operation that is going to be fair both to the American taxpayer as well as to the international community. For this reason, Mr. Chairman, my amendment would require that each license and permit shall contain terms and conditions and, if necessary, restrictions which have due regard for the prevention of waste and future opportunity to commercially recover the unrecovered balance of hard mineral resources.

In other words, what we do not want to do is to have some of these mining companies go in and just skim off the best of these nodules and leave a lot of waste behind them. I do not think this is in the interest of anybody, regardless of which side of the issue they are on.

This amendment, is identical to the Senate language of the same legislation. It is supported by the environmental policy center, by the administration and by the industry and I would hope that this House would see fit to support it.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREBS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I think the chairman of the full committee might accept the amendment; but before doing that, I would like to ask the author of the amendment some questions, because it gives me some problems unless it is clearly defined.

No. 1, I know that many of the undeveloped nations will look at this phrase and will say that this means production controls. I am very concerned about that, too, and I would like to ask the gentleman from California to comment on this.

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I will be glad to do so, if I may draw the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana to the latter portion of my amendment. Let me read the following language that appears in this amendment which should answer the concern of the gentleman, which I certainly submit is a very legitimate concern, I read as follows:

As used in this Act, the term "conservation of natural resources" is not intended to grant, imply, or create any inference of production controls or price regulation.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an additional question?

Mr. KREBS. I am glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, the other concern I have, I think that many companies in the industry fear that if they are operating on a mining site that they have licensed to mine, that this language could conceivably allow the Federal Government to require private enterprise to continue producing the minerals, even when it becomes uneconomical to do so; in other words, when the price of the minerals drops so low that it costs them more to mine than they can get for selling the minerals. Could this language require them to say, "Well, under this law, you must continue to mine whether it is profitable to do so or not."

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I believe the amendment is clear on the subject, that it certainly is not my intention that this be the case. I think it would be unreasonable and I cannot imagine that any Secretary would impose such a requirement under the conditions outlined by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, does the gentleman think it would allow the Federal Government to tell a licensee, "Well, you should mine more manganese than cobalt," when the company is basically on the mining site to mine cobalt as much as possible?

Mr. KREBS. I think the purpose of this amendment, as I stated repeatedly, is to prevent waste, to prevent what would really amount to so-called strip-mining, leaving unnecessary damage or leaving behind any other materials that could reasonably be mined consistent with reasonable commercial commonsense, if you will, in effect require them to mine sufficiently so that waste will not be created.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, I have no complaint if the gentleman's amendment is to insure that the licensee not create any waste pile mining; but I see a whole series of potential problems if we get a secretary that does not agree with my interpretation or the gentleman's language. They could use the language to put in production controls, to tell them they should continue mining a commodity that is not economical to do so and could say, "You must mine copper," when they really want to mine manganese.

I really fear that it is a blanket open endorsement to do all of these things.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BREAUX, and by unanimous consent, Mr. KREBS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, I would like again to respond to the gentleman. I think there is specific language in this amendment which clearly states that it is not the intent of this amendment to provide for production control or price regulation in any shape or form.

I think it comes to a point where the public interest should certainly be taken into consideration. This is a very modest and moderate amendment that I would hope this committee would see fit to adopt. There is certainly adequate language to protect the interests of those involved from any caprice or arbitrary regulation or decisionmaking process by the Secretary.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his answer.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREBS. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a moderate, sensible amendment that clarifies and strengthens the bill. I share some of the concerns the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) has, but in the light of the gentleman's explanation, I think the amendment is good and it ought to be adopted.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREBS. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I thought we had some language which we had agreed upon in the compromise bill which provides for the orderly and efficient processing under the license. I thought that was the agreement among the three committees, and that was, I understood, the language we would go with.

This amendment puts in additional language that certainly causes me a lot of problems, and I thought the amendment was outside the scope of our agreement.

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to use some of my own time, let me emphasize a few points again, in case some of the Members had trouble following me.

Let me point out that the industry is in favor of this language, the Senate has adopted this language, and as I stated previously, the environmental policy groups are in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think that any time we get this kind of cooperation in support of an amendment, it cannot be all wrong.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KREBS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I have examined the amendment. I see nothing in it that requires a prudent operator to do other than what he would do without such an amendment. So I accept the amendment.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this issue came up in the committee debate before all three committees. The language that we have in the so-called compromise bill from which we are now working indicates that this agreement was reached by compromise, and I will qoute from page 4 of the amendment, as follows:

The Congress declares that the purposes of this Act are—

Then we go down to line 14, paragraph (2)— to insure that the development of hard mineral resources of the deep seabed are conducted in a manner which will encourage the orderly and efficient development of such resources, will protect the environment—

Et cetera.

That is the language that we had agreed upon. It clearly states that the Secretary shall require in the licenses and permits that the mineral resources be developed in an orderly and efficient manner.

I am really fearful that the language of the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS), although he said his intent was not to do that, would allow the Secretary to impose production controls and allow the Secretary to say that someone should continue to produce a mineral even though it might not be economically in anyone's interest to do so. If the mineral can only be sold for $5 per pound and if it costs them $10 per pound to produce it, we certainly do not want to authorize a requirement in any permit that they would have to produce it under those circumstances.

I think this amendment just gives the Secretary too much authority, authority which he does not need, and I think the compromise bill addressed this issue properly and clearly spoke to it. I thought that was our agreement.

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KREBS. Mr. Chairman, may I just again very briefly respond? I really regret that this type of an amendment which is so moderate and so basic and is offered to protect the public interest really warrants the type of opposition it is getting. I am really somewhat at a loss to understand it.

I think there is adequate protection here for everybody concerned. This certainly is not going to impose a hardship on anybody if we require such a basic protection for the public interest.

So, Mr. Chairman, I hope the members of this committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I will only add to the gentleman's statement that the amendment is also unnecessary. I say that in very good faith, based on the fact that we have covered this particular problem in the bill that is before the committee, and I think we do it in a manner that would insure that the public interest would be protected but at the same time the licensee would be protected.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I oppose the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I hate to belabor the debate on the amendment, but I might ask the author of the amendment this question:

Does this mean that each permittee must either recover all of the resource or leave a sufficient amount of the resource behind so it can be recovered commercially by a subsequent permittee?

I ask that because, if I read the amendment properly, it says that each permit shall contain conditions which have due regard for the "future opportunity to commercially recover the unrecovered balance of the hard mineral resources."

Does that mean, then, that if any of the resources are left behind, they must be left behind in sufficient quantity to become commercially viable as a future mining operation?

Mr. KREBS. If the gentleman will yield, I will respond to his question.

As I said repeatedly this is the same language as in the Senate bill, and I thought it was clear what this language tries to say—that a person should not go in and just skim off the surface and leave the remaining minerals still there in such a condition that it is going to be very difficult for anybody else to come in and mine the balance.

Mr. RUPPE. Under what condition might he leave any mineral resource behind?

Mr. KREBS. He would be required under this amendment to leave the minerals behind in a condition that some other operator coming in subsequently will be in a position to mine these minerals.

Obviously, as has been pointed out by the gentleman from Louisiana—I tried to respond to him accordingly—we are not going to require anybody to mine the very last minerals that are there. That would be commercially unreasonable.

Mr. RUPPE. It sounds as though any of the materials left behind must be left behind in volume and in a condition so as to be commercially viable for the next operator.

Mr. KREBS. That is correct.

Mr. RUPPE. So what I am saying is: If a permittee takes 80 percent to 90 percent of the resources, it may not be possible to take the last 10 or 20 percent; yet he would have to leave not just the last 20 percent, but perhaps much more behind, because the amendment reads that he has to leave a sufficient quantity so as to be commercially viable.

Mr. KREBS. This is exactly the type of judgment that I think should be spelled out rather than left strictly to the whims of the operator. That is what this amendment is designed to do, and that is what I think this amendment does.

I really do not think, despite the fears that are being expressed here, that any Secretary is going to be capricious in carrying out the spirit of this amendment.

In essence, the amendment tries to prevent the type of arbitrary conduct on the part of any mining operator that happens to be mining a given area. This is in the public interest.

Mr. RUPPE. The Secretary likely will not be capricious, but if the courts are to interpret the amendment, I am concerned with the language that if any resources are left behind, they have to be left behind in volume and in condition so as to be commercially viable. I believe no mining operation is going to take 100 percent of the resources if the technology is not there. Therefore, some of the mineral resources are going to be left behind, and the court might well construe the language to mean, "Well, if you leave any behind, you got to leave enough behind so as to make it commercially viable." Again that is impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KREBS) there were—ayes 11, noes 13.

So the amendments were rejected.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MRS. BOGGS

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mrs. BOGGS: At page 13, between lines 5 and 6, insert the following:

(3) For purposes of the shipping laws of the United States, any vessel documented under the laws of the United States and used in the transportation from any mining site of hard mineral resources recovered under a permit issued under this title shall be deemed to be used in, and used in an essential service in, the foreign commerce or foreign trade of the United States, as defined in section 905(a) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936.

At page 13, line 6, strike out "(3)" and insert "(4)".

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would make it statutorily clear that ocean ore transport carriers documented under the laws of the United States would be considered as being in foreign trade, and as such, would be eligible for a construction differential subsidy (CDS) and an operating differential subsidy (ODS) authorized by the Merchant Marine Act of 1936.

With the amendment previously offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY), at least one ore carrier per mine site will be documented under U.S. law. It is in the national interest to encourage the building of such ore carriers in the United States.

This amendment does not require that ore carriers actually be built in the United States. However, if a U.S. citizen who holds a permit under this legislation decides to build its U.S.-flag carrier in our country, this amendment would make such carrier eligible for construction and operational subsidies.

Mr. Chairman, in correspondence received from the Assistant Secretary for Maritime Affairs, Mr. Robert J. Blackwell, it is indicated that it is the judgment of his office that the ore transport carriers are engaged in the "foreign commerce" or "foreign trade," as those terms are designated in the Merchant Marine Act. Because eligibility for CDS and ODS is dependent on vessels being engaged in foreign trade, Mr. Blackwell suggests that this legislation be amended to make it absolutely clear that these differentials apply.

Additionally, to be eligible for the operating-differential subsidy, a vessel must be used "in an essential service in" the foreign commerce or foreign trade of the United States.

At the present time, Mr. Chairman, there is not a single ore carrier on order in an American shipyard. This amendment encourages, it does not require, that the vessels be constructed in the United States. It should also be pointed out that the amendment does not address itself to the construction of a mining and processing vessel, but only to the ore carriers and only to those documented under U.S. laws.

At most, Mr. Chairman, this will probably involve only one ship per mine site, and will not have a serious effect on the foreign partners of the American mining companies.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. BOGGS. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, we have seen amendments defeated today on the basis that this is a compromise bill arranged by three different committees. Has the amendment which the gentlewoman is proposing been submitted to those three committees, according to the agreement?

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Chairman, I would like for the gentlewoman to know that it was considered that this definition was really inherent in the bill; but to make it absolutely clear, to make it statutorily clear that these vessels, the ore-carrying vessels, are indeed engaged in foreign trade or foreign commerce and in the interest of the United States, we put this amendment in to simplify it and to clarify it.

Mrs. FENWICK. Therefore, the gentlewoman is telling me that this amendment as to the ships qualifying for foreign trade status has been agreed to by the three committees of the House which apparently approved the bill; is that correct?

Mrs. BOGGS. I will have to defer to the chairman of the committee. I do not think this was ever brought up as an amendment.

Mrs. FENWICK. I ask this because other amendments have been defeated on the ground that this bill had been agreed to by the three committees. It seems to me that this is yet another amendment.

Mrs. BOGGS. There were areas that were agreed upon to be brought up and considered as amendments on the floor. This was one of the areas we felt should be brought to the floor only because we wanted to make it statutorily clear that these vessels, ore-carrying vessels, would indeed be in foreign trade, in foreign commerce, and in the interest of the United States.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman; I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentlewoman from Louisiana (Mrs. BOGGS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 4, noes 2.

So the amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. VENTO

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VENTO:

SEC. 109. PUBLIC NOTICE AND HEARINGS, CITIZENS CIVIL ACTIONS AND JUDICIAL REVIEW.

(a) PUBLIC NOTICE AND HEARINGS.—(1) The Secretary may promulgate rules and regulations; establish and modify the terms, conditions and restrictions of licenses and permits; issue, transfer, and renew licenses and permits; and deny, suspend, and revoke licenses and permits only after public notice and public hearings in accordance with this subsection. Any interested person may present relevant material at any hearing.

(2) If the Secretary determines that there exists one or more specific and material factual issues which may be resolved by a formal evidentiary hearing, at least one adjudicatory hearing shall be held in the District of Columbia in accordance with the provisions of section 554 of title 5 of the United States Code. The record developed in any such adjudicatory hearing shall be part of the basis for the Secretary's decision to take any action referred to in paragraph (1). Hearings held pursuant to this subsection shall be consolidated insofar as practicable with hearings held by other agencies. The Secretary shall by regulations prescribe the time period for holding public hearings.

(b) CITIZEN CIVIL ACTIONS.—(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), any person may commence a civil action for equitable relief on his own behalf, whenever such action constitutes a case or controversy, against any person, including the United States, and any other governmental instrumentality or agency (to the extent permitted by the eleventh amendment to the Constitution), who is alleged to be in violation of any provision of this Act, any regulation promulgated under this Act, or any term, condition, or restriction of a license or permit issued under this Act. In suits brought under this subsection, the district courts shall have jurisdiction without regard to the amount in controversy or the citizenship of the parties, to enforce any provision of this Act or to order the Secretary to perform such act or duty, as the case may be.

(2) No civil action may be commenced under paragraph (1)—

(A) prior to 60 days after the plaintiff has given notice of the alleged violation to the Secretary and any other appropriate Federal official and to any alleged violator; and

(B) if the Secretary or his authorized representative, any other appropriate Federal official, or the Attorney General has commenced and is diligently prosecuting a civil or criminal action in a court of the United States, but in any such action any person having a legal interest which is or may be adversely affected or aggrieved may intervene as a matter of right.

Notice under this subsection shall be given in such a manner as the Secretary shall prescribe by regulation.

(3) In any action under this subsection, the Secretary or the Attorney General, if not a party, may intervene as a matter of right.

(4) Any district court, in issuing any final order in any action brought under paragraph (1), may award costs of litigation, including reasonable attorney's and expert witness fees, to any party whenever the court determines that such an award is appropriate.

(5) Nothing in this subsection shall restrict any right which any person or persons or class may have under any statute or common law to seek enforcement of any provision of this Act, any regulation issued thereunder, or any term, condition, or restriction of any license or permit; or to seek any other relief.

(c) JUDICIAL REVIEW.—Any person suffering legal wrong, or who is or may be adversely affected, by the Secretary's decision to issue, deny, transfer, modify, renew, suspend, or revoke a license or permit may, not later than 60 days after any such decision is made, seek judicial review of such decision in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia. Any person shall be deemed to be aggrieved by the Secretary's decision within the meaning of this subsection if the person—

(1) participated in the administrative proceedings before the Secretary, or did not participate but can show that the failure to do so was caused by the Secretary's failure to provide the required notice; and

(2) is adversely affected by the Secretary's action.

Mr. VENTO (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, the role of the public in the decisionmaking process is a vital function in the maintenance of a strong and responsive democratic government. From the town-hall meetings to public initiatives and referendums, American history is filled with examples of the benefits of citizen participation. In recent history, public input has been expanded to include participation in the development of executive decisions and recommendations. This has resulted in policies that better reflect the views of the people and are more responsive to our Nation's needs. This Congress has reaffirmed the right of the public to participate in the decisionmaking process by including provisions for citizen input in such legislation and H.R. 2, the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977, and H.R. 1614, the Outer Continental Lands Act of 1977. The amendment that I am offering is a continuation of the process which is so ingrained in American history.

The impact of deep seabed mining is the concern of all mankind. The wealth and quality of the oceans do not exclusively belong to any one country but are the "common heritage of mankind." In our efforts to mine the ocean floor great care must be taken that our policies and actions do not harm the marine environment. This concern can be best assured by guranteeing a place for public participation. By assuring citizen input we will be providing the Secretary with a valuable source of information and a proper balance to the input of the developing interests. The policy that results from this process will result in a viable means to mine the ocean floor that considers environmental concerns and development needs.

The amendment I am offering establishes the needed forum for citizen participation. It provides for:

First. Public participation in the development of the Secretary's rules, regulations, and licensing decisions. This function will avoid lengthy litigation by providing a forum for input during the decisionmaking process and will result in a balanced, sound policy.

Second. Citizen civil action. By allowing for citizen civil action, an important oversight function can be played by the public. All too often, congressional intent is frustrated by bureaucratic bungling and neglect. This provision will help to insure that the regulatory agency will execute this act in a conscientious manner. Concern has been expressed that this provision will result in falicious lawsuits and lengthy delays. I submit that this is not the case. Sufficient safeguards exist in this amendment to prevent such suits and history has indicated that such suits are not as prevalent as some would suggest.

Third. Judicial review. This will provide concerned parties with a mechanism to appeal secretarial decisions and will allow for a speedy resolution to any conflicts that may occur.

The processes included in my amendment will benefit environmentalists and developers alike. Developers will now have a mechanism for input into the development of the Secretary's policies and their expertise will be a valuable contribution to the development of our Nation's deep seabed mining policy. The judicial review process will provide all interests with a means to appeal adverse secretarial decisions.

Public participation plays a necessary role in our governmental process. As the Interior Committee report on H.R. 2 noted:

> While citizen participation is not, and cannot be, a substitute for governmental authority, citizen involvement in all phases of the regulatory scheme will help insure that the decisions and actions of the regulatory authority are grounded upon complete and full information. In addition, providing citizen access to administrative appellate procedures and the courts is a practical and legitimate method of assuring the regulatory authority's compliance with the requirements of the Act. Thus in imposing several provisions which contemplate active citizen involvement, the Committee is carrying out its conviction that the participation of private citizens is a vital factor in the regulatory program as established by the Act.

A similar amendment to the deep sea mining legislation, H.R. 12988, will prove to be as vital to the development of a sound deep seabed mining policy. I urge my colleagues to reaffirm our commitment to the public's role in the decisionmaking process by supporting this amendment. In this way, we will have a viable policy that reflects environmental concerns and development needs.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota because I do not think it is in the public interest. The bill has a great deal of public participation already built in. Many of the actions will be subject to the National Environmental Policy Act and involves a great deal of public hearings and participation.

They will be subject also to the Administrative Procedure Act and will protect the public in that way.

The gentleman's amendment goes far beyond any existing law on any Federal books which provide for public participation in any decisionmaking by any Federal agency.

The amendment offered by the gentleman would provide for informal type public hearings every time, for example, a license was issued or transferred—and we do not even provide for the latter in the bill—and when the Secretary refuses to revoke a license, it would be subject to public hearing. Any interested person may present relevant materal at any hearing. Almost any condition of licenses and permits would be subject to informal public hearing requirements. If the Secretary determines that there exists one or more specific and material factual issues there may be a requirement for formal evidentiary hearings.

I do not think we can say that every time a Secretary who is in charge of running a program makes a decision, that he has to have public hearings, informal or formal, to make sure he is doing it correctly.

I think the law we have before us is very adequate as far as protecting the public interest is concerned. I think the cost to the public of the proposed amendment will be excessive and greatly will exceed the potential benefits that could be gained as a result of the gentleman's agreement.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I agree with the presentation and the reasons set forth by the gentleman from Louisiana. It seems to me this would make every rulemaking proceeding subject to a hearing. That could be very time consuming and costly, and in view of the fact that there are many protections built into the legislation, as the gentleman has just stated, I believe it is going far beyond what should be in legislation of this type.

I oppose the amendment.

Mr. VENTO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr.VENTO. Mr. Chairman, it says that if the Secretary finds there exists one or more specific and material factual issues which will be resolved by a formal evidentiary hearing. It does not require formal evidentiary hearings for every rule and it gives that discretion to the Secretary. I think the public should certainly be a part of the process when it occurs.

Certainly, notice and public participation is essential to the orderly resolution and proper consideration of issues. The provisions in the current measure offer little or no opportunity except in the EIS or NEPA process. I think it is important to recognize that other issues are of public interest and concern and that the only way to safeguard against arbitrary actions and agreements by the Secretary is through public participation. The measure currently overlooks this phenomena, and you have not addressed the right to civil suit which exists in both the Coal Strip Mining Act and the OCS legislation.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I have the time and I reclaim my time.

I think we are talking about two different things. I have a problem with that section and also with the one dealing with the informal hearings on every step the Secretary would take practically.

We have in the bill requirements on issuance of licenses and requirements for environmental impact statements, and at any stage where there is any importance, an environmental impact is already required, and I think the public has every opportunity under the compromise bill now pending to voice their views as to whether the law is being carried out as intended.

If we are trying to cut down on bureaucracy and expense of Government, we should vote against the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota. I think it is well intended, but I do not think it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. VENTO).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. VENTO) there were—ayes 8, noes 11.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. STARK

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STARK: In section 4495(b) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as proposed to be added by the Committee Amendment), strike out "3.75 percent" and insert in lieu thereof "10 percent".

In section 4497(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (as proposed to be added by the Committee Amendment) strike out "20 percent of".

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, I am offering an amendment to the Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act which would modify the trust fund provisions of the committee bill. The tax rate recommended by the committee equals a rate of three-fourths of 1 percent on total revenues. My amendment would increase this amount to a flat 10 percent of total revenues from seabed operations. my reasons for doing this are several:

First. The United States has endorsed the concept of the "common ownership by all nations" of ocean resources. This trust fund is the means by which all nations will share in the enormous wealth beneath the oceans. The trust fund concept has been resolved at the Law of the Sea negotiations and the crucial point which remains is the appropriate level of a tax. Current proposals, at the Conference. range from 7 to 10 percent, with some countries advocating a much higher tax. No nation has proposed a tax as miniscule as this bill proposes. So, we are setting a tax, at a wholly unrealistic level, with the knowledge—and admission by our negotiators—that our actions will have little bearing on the eventual outcome of the negotiations. In short, the Congress will have to address the issue of the tax rate at some time in the future. I maintain that it is far easier to set a tax at a relatively high rate and bring it down than to impose a low charge and struggle to raise it.

We can all visualize the difficult fight that we would have increasing the tax once the companies have become accustomed to the miniscule amount we have before us. Furthermore, because of a "grandfathering" provision in H.R. 12988, there is some question whether we will ever be able to raise the tax. even if the negotiations result in a higher rate.

If the United States, and ultimately the industrialized world in general, truly believe in the concept of the "common heritage of man" we should espouse that concept economically as well as rhetorically. I fear that our actions will be interpreted by the other parties to the LOS Treaty to mean that the treaty is meaningless. I want to state categorically that the tax rate that we are setting today is not an official statement of our position at the LOS Conference. I quote from the Ways and Means Committee report:

The rate of tax set in the bill is not intended to serve as a guideline or precedent which would be binding for any profit sharing agreement negotiated by the United States at the LOS conference.

I fear that a ridiculously low tax would result in a hardening of the positions at the LOS Conference and an increase in world tensions. We simply cannot afford to let this happen.

The second issue that I would like to address is the economic argument. Proponents of the low tax rate contend that the mining companies need great incentives to make the huge investments for deep seabed mining ventures. I would hope that we do not turn this into a small business issue, for the companies that are involved are not your Mom and Pop operations. Lockheed, Exxon, Sun Oil—to name a few—have been at the forefront of deep seabed development. The technology has been developed (without Government incentives). So there must be something which has been spurring investment thus far.

MIT has conducted an analysis of potential deep seabed operations and the resulting cost/benefit figures are astounding. The MIT report projects that each mining site will have an annual operating expense of $100 million. Total revenues from each project will be almost $260 million. This is a 160-percent profit margin. In our free enterprise system, I would think that a potential profit in this amount would be sufficient incentive to attract investment. The tax from each of these projects, based upon the MIT figures, would be a mere $2 million. Keep in mind that these figures apply to each project and the Interior Department estimates that there are at least 400 prime mining sites to be developed. The potential revenues that are involved are truly staggering, and the incentives are there for continued development. Why should we risk antagonizing other nations in the world to provide even greater incentives for huge corporations? Under our economic system, as we all know, risks are taken when there is a reasonable assurance of a return. I do not see how a tax rate of 10 percent can even dim the prospects of the tremendous profits which will be gained from ASSE operations. In closing, our commitment to the common heritage of the seas must be reaffirmed. and a vote in support of my amendment will signify to the world that we are willing to take our place in the world community.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK).

Mr. Chairman, the amendment raises several serious questions.

All four committees of jurisdiction were opposed to the amendment. The chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Ways and Means particularly expressed their opposition to it, as did the other three committees and the administration and the industry.

The figure that was arrived at, of course, was agreed upon by the aforementioned people. I think if we go to a rate such as is recommended in this amendment we will be surely hurting our negotiators who will eventually be arriving at some figure.

We realize that during this period of time the American companies involved will be paying U.S. income tax as well as this percentage to any eventual fund set up by the Law of the Sea regime. So I would think the most prudent position would be to defeat this amendment and permit our negotiators to have that flexibility, and not to saddle American companies with such a very high figure.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, will the distinguished chairman yield to me?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STARK. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would assume, then, from what the gentleman has said that should the negotiators set a tax at 5 percent, 4 percent, or 3 percent, then, the gentleman would have no objection to our subsequently raising this tax to conform to whatever is negotiated in the Law of the Sea Conference?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. The treaty would then become international law but it would have to be acceptable to the Senate. We would have no say at that time because this legislation provides the trigger so that it is to be displaced by the accepted and agreed-on treaty and the conditions therein.

Mr. STARK. What the gentleman is saying to me is, should the Conference come up with a higher figure than the three-quarters of 1 percent, the gentleman would have no objection to agreeing to a subsequent increase, if that is the result of treaty negotiations?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Subject to the approval of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. STARK. Yes.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman's amendment is a very little amendment. It only increases the tax liabilities by about 1,300 percent from what the administration has proposed and from what the four committees proposed. That has the effect of completely destroying the project, I would say to the gentleman. If the international treaty comes back with a higher figure than we have and we accept it, that then becomes the law of the land. But I think everybody agrees this is a fair percentage that has been worked out by everybody.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I will say I cannot support the amendment because it is such a drastic increase in the fee that the administration sent forward, but I must say I agree with some of the observations of the gentleman from California. I think the administration did move too quickly and did not set a realistic figure in the beginning.

I also agree with the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that if the administration should finally negotiate a treaty and it is approved by the Senate, it would prevail. This is not written in stone, and we can come back and look at it again. So for those reasons I will vote against the amendment.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUPPE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think, as has been suggested, if the Senate accepts any proposed treaty that comes out of a future Law of the Sea Conference, then that will be the law of the land along with the excise taxes running to that particular treaty. I will say I think our imposing a 10-percent tax now is a rather dangerous precedent in the sense that we are dependent on foreign producers for nickel and cobalt, so that actually a 10-percent excise tax is not just a tax on American companies; it is really a tax on American consumers. It is a consumer tax and not a corporate tax.

The second danger of imposing a tax at the present time is that we are dependent on foreign sources of supply for almost all of our nickel and for virtually all of our cobalt. If we suggest a 10-percent excise tax in our own legislation, in my opinion, that would be inviting foreign producers of those metals worldwide to start initiating a sharply higher excise tax of their own, and again that tax passed on to American companies could only result in higher consumer costs. So I think it is not an opportune time at this moment to pass that.

Mr. STARK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. STARK. I thank the gentleman for yielding. I think it is important to point out that industrialized countries like Australia have been willing to offer 7 percent. Some countries have suggested 15, and some other developed countries have talked about as low as 3 or 5 percent. The latest American position at the LOS Conference has been around 2 percent plus profitsharing. So the profits on these operations are so substantial that the excise tax would not be significant in deterring development.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I would like to ask the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK) is there any truth to the rumor that the Soviet Union is offering 10 percent?

Mr. STARK. If the gentleman will yield, I think it has been part of the negotiations, yes.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. If they are offering 10 percent and we are offering this piddling amount we are offering, are we not in danger of driving people into the arms of the godless athiests, the Communist Soviet Socialist Republic offering 10 percent? They are trying to take the free enterprise system of ours and ram it down our throats.

Mr. STARK. I would like to think that the underdeveloped nations of the world would understand that under the free enterprise system the advantages would be so great even if we raise the tax by the amount suggested by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) that they would still choose our system at three-quarters of 1 percent over the Communist system of 10 percent. While what the gentleman is suggesting could be the outcome, I am sure economic conditions would not be the overriding determination, but that they would choose the free enterprise system with the major corporations that are involved.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Would the gentleman agree with me that an anti-Communist vote on this would be in favor of the gentleman's amendment and against the Soviet Union's 10 percent?

Mr. STARK. Absolutely. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to H.R. 12988, the Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act.

As a congressional adviser to the U.N. Law of the Sea Conference, I have been following the LOS deliberations very closely and I have discussed the issues involved in the negotiations with a wide variety of delegates to the conference. In my view, enactment of unilateral legislation by the United States would be a serious mistake.

The unilateral approach to deepsea mining is contrary both to our national interest and to the interests of the international community. It would be harmful to the U.N. effort to negotiate a comprehensive LOS treaty. It would severely damage U.S. credibility in the eyes of the world. And, it could provoke retaliatory action against our country by angry states.

In considering this issue, it is important to understand the history of the Law of the Sea negotiations and the interrelationship between those negotiations and domestic legislation. In 1970, the U.N. General Assembly passed a declaration that stated that—

> The seabed and ocean floor, and subsoil thereof, beyond the limits of national jurisdiction (hereinafter referred to as the area), as well as the resources of the area, are the common heritage of mankind. The area shall not be subject to appropriation by any means, by States or persons, natural or juridicial, and no State shall claim or exercise sovereignty or sovereign rights over any part thereof.

This declaration was adopted in a vote of 108 to 0, with 14 abstentions. The United States voted for the declaration. Now, 8 years later, Congress is preparing to pass legislation which would authorize the U.S. Government to unilaterally license private companies to mine the ocean floor without regard to the 1970 U.N. declaration.

Proponents of H.R. 12988 argue that the intransigent attitude of certain Third World countries has hamstrung the LOS Conference and that unilateral legislation would provide leverage to force greater cooperation by such states toward establishment of an international regime to regulate the development of the ocean floor. Such an argument neglects the fact that while the sixth session did not seem to be very productive, the most recent session in Geneva did make significant progress. Agreement in principle has now been reached on a number of important issues, including offshore oil and gas rights, fishery management, navigation through straits, marine pollution, limits on territorial seas and economic zones, and procedures for settlement of disputes. These agreements could well be jeopardized if enactment of unilateral legislation induces other countries to abandon the conference out of disillusionment with the United States. Several delegates have told me that certain nations will, indeed, break off negotiations if such legislation is enacted.

In addition, if the U.S. Government unilaterally licenses private companies to exploit minerals on the ocean floor which we have already agreed do not belong to any one nation, the threat of retaliatory action will be real. This could take various forms: Lawsuits against the companies involved in deep sea mining ventures; the expropriation of U.S. property abroad in return for what nations compute to be the value of deep sea resources exploited by private firms; or even resort to force.

Enactment of unilateral legislation would also very likely have a deleterious impact on the tenuous web of international agreements that have been so painstakingly constructed through mutual accommodation and compromise by all nations. And, at the very least, it would certainly be interpreted by many nations as an indication that our professed commitment to equity and a world in which no nation takes advantage of any other is little more than rhetoric.

The potential costs of unilateral legislation are clearly high. Yet, it appears that there is strong support in the House for its enactment?

Why?

I believe that the answer to this question lies in the fact that the real prime mover behind this legislation has been the ocean mining industry led by four powerful mining consortia who alone currently possess the technology to exploit the ocean floor. In view of the economic potential of deep sea mining operations, it makes sense for them to spend the money and effort to implement legislation favorable to their interests, and they have retained expensive Washington lobbyists to advocate their case, both on Capitol Hill and with U.S. LOS negotiators.

The mining industry lobby has had a formidable forum from which to advocate their case. They sit in on deliberations at the LOS Conference at the U.N. They participate in discussions at briefings. And they have been very active in lobbying Congress. In fact, the consortium led by Kennecott Copper even hired the former chief U.S. negotiator for deep sea mining as legal counsel, an individual who has stated his belief that—

> There's merit in the so-called revolving door syndrome between industry and government. Otherwise, government agencies become too insulated from commercial interests and concerns.

As we have seen all too frequently in a variety of areas, the other side of this coin is that the "revolving door syndrome" also often serves to insulate officials from the public interest.

The degree of influence by the mining industry on this legislation and the U.N. negotiations is not likely to diminish with the passage of H.R. 12988. On the contrary, the mining companies will in all likelihood look upon House passage of this bill as an opportunity to accelerate their demand and pressure for unilateral exploitation of the deep seabed for their own gain and profit.

In what is claimed to be an act of good faith and an indication that the United States does support the principle that the resources of the sea belong to all mankind, a title has been added to H.R. 12988 which would establish a revenue sharing trust fund to purportedly share the profits of deep-sea mining with the rest of the world. While I find the inclusion of such a fund to be the least objectionable aspect of the legislation, I believe that the current level of contribution to the fund is ridiculously low.

It is important to note that the level of excise tax to be assessed against private firms as a contribution to the revenue sharing fund; that is, three-fourths of 1 percent—is an industry proposal and constitutes an amount substantially lower than what is being discussed at the LOS negotiations. If those who advocate this bill as only an interim measure are indeed sincere in their desire to obtain an international agreement, then they should take the revenue sharing fund a good deal more seriously than the meaningless gesture it currently represents in H.R. 12988.

Mr. Chairman, what is debatable here is why at this early stage, with commercial recovery not due to begin until 1985 at the earliest, the committee would take the lowest possible figure for the revenue sharing assessment. It is a level set by industry and completely disregards the effects this miniscule contribution will have upon the international negotiations over revenue sharing.

The law of the sea negotiations have been discussing royalty payments of from 7 to 15 percent. The American negotiators most recent offer is around 2 percent royalty payment plus a profit-sharing proposal.

Thus, the really crucial question is this: If our LOS negotiators are able to get their proposal accepted; that is, the 2-percent royalty plus a profit-sharing proposal—how supportive will the ocean mining industry be when the treaty comes before the U.S. Senate for ratification if it already has unilateral legislation in place requiring tax contributions of only three-quarters of 1 percent?

I remember only too well the day one of our chief negotiators told me it would be impossible to get the Senate to approve a treaty which was not acceptable to the mining companies. Now can we really expect to find the mining companies lining up to support a treaty which very well may ask them to make a revenue sharing contribution larger than what they have with domestic legislation?

The amendment offered by Mr. STARK would increase the excise tax on nodules removed from the deep seabed to 10 percent of gross receipts. Proponents of the three-fourths of 1 percent provision contained in the bill argue that uncertainty about the profitability of deep sea mining at this time requires that the revenue sharing assessment be kept low, and they point to a recent MIT study on the projected profitability of deep sea mining to substantiate this view. There has been much confusing information circulated in regard to that MIT study.

To clear the record, this study indicated a projected rate of return on investment of 18 percent without royalties and 15 percent with the 10-percent tax proposed by the Stark amendment. Most investors would agree that 15 percent is not a bad rate of return on an investment. It is true that costs might exceed those projected in the study, but it is equally true that prices of some of these metals might recover from their current depressed value. A mere 10-percent increase in the prices of these minerals would completely make up for the effect of the Stark amendment.

Indeed, if the price of nickel alone were just to return to the 1976 price, it would more than make up for the royalties provided in the Stark amendment. Projections indicate significantly improved prices on nickel by the time deep sea mining would begin.

The central question is obvious. Does the mining industry want an international treaty? Or are they interested only in that proposal which will allow them their maximum profit picture?

I do not intend to find fault with corporation executives' business-like approach to the issue of deep seabed mining. Their mandate is to promote growth and maximize profits for their firms. However, our mandate is different. As responsible public officials should we not be willing to look at the larger picture and ask what is right, and just, and fair?

Mr. Chairman, I submit that we should be concerned with the best interests of the United States of America, not with the narrow selfish economic interests of four powerful mining consortia. I believe that it is clearly in our national interest to see a comprehensive Law of the Sea Treaty in place. Thus, if the support of the ocean mining industry is essential for Senate ratification of a Law of the Sea Treaty, we certainly must be out of our minds to pass unilateral legislation which includes a lower royalty payment than will be negotiated in the treaty.

I urge passage of the Stark amendment.

Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words. I rise in support of the amendment. I think it will send a positive message. It will say to the Law of the Sea negotiators that we want to get started on deep sea mining, but we would also like to see an international agreement on the matter. We want our private firms to begin exploration, but we still believe that the oceans are the common heritage of mankind.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support the amendment.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. MEYNER. I yield to the gentlewoman from New Jersey.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is a company in its right mind which would ever go into a contract giving 10 percent of the gross. I have been in favor of private enterprise, it will surprise many people here today. I think this amendment is totally unrealistic. It will encourage other countries to say, "We want 15 percent, not 10."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. STARK).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STARK) there were—ayes 8, noes 18.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to engage the chairman of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY), in a colloquy on the language of title II.

I would like to raise two points with the gentleman.

First, I would like to ask the gentleman to confirm for the RECORD the understanding we reached on the interpretation of sections 201 and 202. The bill as reported by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee contained a provision whereby companies which suffered any loss of investment due to the entering into force of a Law of the Sea Treaty for the United States could be compensated for such loss by the U.S. Government. This provision was stricken by the Interior and International Relations Committees, and was strongly opposed by the administration. In our three committee negotiations, my colleagues, Mr. UDALL and Mr. FRASER, and I indicated that we could not support any bill which came to the floor with this provision in it. The gentleman agreed to eliminate this provision, in exchange for a strong grandfather clause. Subsequently, we agreed to such a clause, which essentially states the intent of Congress that the interests of U.S. citizens should be protected in any treaty. I support this strong statement so long as it is not construed as a back-door way of providing investment guarantees. To meet this concern the gentleman agreed that the language of sections 201 and 202 does not express a legal or moral obligation on the part of the U.S. Government to compensate any company for any impairment of the value of its investment which might occur in connection with the entering into force of an international agreement with respect to the United States. The gentleman has exchanged letters confirming this understanding with Mr. UDALL, Mr. FRASER, and me.

I would like to ask the gentleman if he is prepared to confirm this understanding for the RECORD, and if he would agree to insert our exchange of letters in the RECORD as an authoritative statement of the intent of the House?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Yes, the gentleman's interpretation of sections 201 and 202 reflects my understanding of those provisions and I have no objection to the insertion of our letters in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. Second, the gentleman is in receipt of a memorandum from the Congressional Research Service, dated March 22, 1978, which addresses two questions: Does section 201 obligate the President to reach an international agreement that is "substantially" the same in its "terms, conditions, and restrictions" as contained in title I of H.R. 3350; and does not "materially impair" the value of investments made, and is there any basis for a claim against the U.S. Government in sections 201 and 202 if the agreement reached by the President is not "substantially" the same as H.R. 3350, or does "materially impair" the value of investments? In short, the memo concludes that the answer to both questions is "No."

Would the gentleman agree to the inclusion of that memorandum in the RECORD as an authoritative statement of the intent of the House?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. The CRS memorandum to which the gentleman refers reflects my understanding, and I have no objection to its inclusion in the RECORD.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I include the material referred to at this point in the RECORD as part of the legislative history of the bill.

Mr. Chairman, with this legislative history, I support the present language of sections 201 and 202 of the bill.

Hon. JOHN M. MURPHY,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: We are writing to confirm our agreement on the meaning of sections 201 and 202 of H.R. 12988.

At the meeting at which we finalized our agreement to introduce a consensus bill, we agreed that sections 201 and 202 do not express a legal or moral obligation on the part of the United States government to compensate any United States citizen for any impairment of the value of its investment in any operation for the exploration for, or commercial recovery of, hard mineral resources of the deep seabed under Title I which might occur in connection with the entering into force of an international agreement with respect to the United States.

We believe it would be a disservice to the ocean mining industry if ambiguities in H.R. 12988 led companies to invest in mining ventures on the false understanding that investment guarantees are provided or implied by the language of sections 201 and 202.

We would propose to establish this understanding in the legislative history of H.R. 12988 through a colloquy on the floor.

We would appreciate your confirmation of this agreement.

Sincerely,

MORRIS K. UDALL.

DEAR JOHN: We are writing to confirm our agreement on the meaning of sections 201 and 202 of H.R. 12988.

At the meeting at which we finalized our agreement to introduce a consensus bill, we agreed that sections 201 and 202 do not express a legal or moral obligation on the part of the United States government to compensate any United States citizen for any impairment of the value of its investment in any operation for the exploration for, or commercial recovery of, hard mineral resources of the deep seabed under Title I which might occur in connection with the entering into force of an international agreement with respect to the United States.

Hon. MORRIS K. UDALL,
Chairman, Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MO: This is to confirm the understanding we had with respect to sections 201 and 202 of H.R. 12988 as stated in your letter of July 14, 1978.

We agreed to establish this understanding in the legislative history of the bill through a colloquy on the floor on Thursday. This colloquy should be prepared ahead of time by our staff and conform to the substance of your letter.

WASHINGTON, DC.,
March 22, 1978.

To: The Honorable John M. Murphy, Chairman, Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, U.S. House of Representatives. ATTN: Dr. Thomas Kitsos.

From: Thomas E. Kane, Attorney/Analyst in Marine Science Environment and Natural Resources Policy Division.

Subject: Effects of sections 201 and 202 of the Committee Print of March 3, 1978, which is proposed as an amendment in the nature of a substitute H.R. 3350.

This is in response to your inquiry pertaining to weather sections 201 and 202 of H.R. 3350 (Committee Print of March 3, 1978) would create a cause of action against the United States for those U.S. citizens who may have commenced deep seabed mining development prior to the adoption of an international agreement binding on the U.S., and who are financially damaged (e.g., investments are impaired) as a result of the terms of such agreement? That is, can a U.S. citizen as defined in H.R. 3350 recover damages against the U.S. for the impairment of the value of investments made for ocean mining development as a result of an agreement binding upon the U.S. because of the language of sections 201 and 202, of the March 3, 1978. Committee Print?

Before answering that query, it might be helpful to address two separate aspects of the question: (1) Does section 201 obligate the President to reach an international agreement that (a) is "substantially" the same in its "terms, conditions and restrictions" as contained in Title I of H.R. 3350, and (b) does not "materially impair" the value of investment made; and, (2) is there any basis for a claim against the U.S. government in sections 201 or 202 if the agreement reached by the President is not "substantially" the same as H.R. 3350, or does "materially impair" the value of investments?

(1) Sections 201 and 202 are contained in Title II of the Committee Print of March 3, 1978, which is a proposed amendment in the nature of a substitute for H.R. 3350 (Deep Seabed Hard Mineral Resources Act.) Title II addresses the transition to an international agreement. Section 201 is entitled "Declaration of Congressional Intent," and states:

"It is the intent of Congress—

"(1) that any international agreement to which the United States becomes a party should, in addition to promoting other national oceans objectives—

"(A) provide assured and nondiscriminatory access . . . to the hard mineral resources of the deep seabed for United States citizens, and

"(B) recognize the rights of United States citizens . . . to continue their operations under substantially the same terms, conditions, and restrictions as have been imposed on them under title I . . . or otherwise provide for the continuation of such operations in a manner that does not materially impair the value of investments that have been made in relation to them." [Emphasis added.]

The key word is clearly "should." Even presuming arguendo that the Congress could enact language that bound the President to a particular course of action, or negotiating position, as well as what terms must be included in an agreement, the language here clearly does not do so. There is no mandate that the U.S. must negotiate an international agreement that recognizes the rights of U.S. citizens to continue ocean mining operations "under substantially the same terms, conditions and resolutions," or that their value of investment not be "materially impaired." Rather the Congress, were it to enact this language, would only be expressing its interest that an international agreement should recognize rights of existing U.S. operations.

The issue of whether the Congress could so mandate is not raised here. If it were, the conclusion would appear to resolve itself that Congress could not so bind the prerogatives of the President and mandate how the President should conduct negotiations and what positions or terms he must accept or abide by in the negotiation process. Although there is no case directly on point, the case of United States v. Curtiss-Wright Export Corp., 299 U.S. 304, 82 L.ed. 255(1936), is helpful in identifying the respective roles of the President and Senate during international negotiations. The issue before the Court is Curtiss-Wright concerned, inter alia, the legislative character of Presidential powers when dealing in foreign relations.

Not only did the Court point out the extraordinary character of Presidential powers in foreign affairs, but specifically pointed out that Congressional powers in the area of negotiation were nonexistent.

The Court said:

"Not only, as we have shown, is the Federal power over external affairs in origin and essential character different from that over internal affairs, but participation in the exercise of the power is significantly limited. In this vast external realm, with its important, complicated, delicate and manifold problems, the President alone has the power to speak or listen as a representative of the nation. He makes treaties with the advice and consent of the Senate; but he alone negotiates. Into the field of negotiation the Senate cannot intrude; and Congress itself is powerless to invade it. As Marshall said in his great argument of March 7, 1880, in the House of Representatives, 'The President is the sole organ of the nation in its external relations, and its sole representative with foreign nations.' " Annals, 6th Cong., col. 613.[1]

The Court went on to say:

"The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at a very early day in our history (February 15, 1816), reported to the Senate, among other things, as follows:

" 'The President is the constitutional representative of the United States with regard to foreign nations. He manages our concerns with foreign nations and must necessarily be most competent to determine when, how, and upon what subjects negotiation may be urged with the greatest prospect of success . . . They think the interference of the Senate in the direction of foreign negotiations calculated to diminish that responsibility and thereby to impair the best security for the national safety. . . .' " 8 U.S. Sen. Reports Comm. on Foreign Relations, p. 24.[2]

It would appear well-settled that the President is the sole voice of the United States during international negotiations; and that he alone determines when, how and what subjects will be negotiated. The Senate is given an opportunity to express its view and to grant or withhold consent after agreement is reached, and before ratification. It would appear "extremely impolitic"[3] to mandate in advance or even during negotiations what position the U.S. will take on a particular subject; and sections 201 and 202 of H.R. 3350, do not attempt to do so. It seems clear that any attempt by Congress to so bind the President would be unsuccessful. See also Schwartz, B., The Powers of Government, Vol. II, sec. 212, pp. 117–212 (1963); and Henkin, L., Foreign Affairs and the Constitution, Chap. V, p. 129 et. seq.

Therefore, since the Congress cannot bind the President to a negotiating position or result, there is no duty to follow the wishes of the Congress. There clearly is no language in sections 201 or 202 that specifically gives a U.S. citizen a right to make a claim against the government if it fails to protect the value of investments in a future international agreement on the subject. Since there is no specific right to assert a claim contained in the language of sections 201 or 202, the only right that is possible is one that would arise out of a duty owed. Since no duty exists by reason of section 201, no right to make a claim is possible by reason of this language.

(2) Likewise, section 202 does not establish a right to claim damages for the impairment of the value of investment in the event that an international agreement is damaging to those persons who might be conducting deep seabed mining development under title I of the bill at the time an international agreement on the subject matter becomes binding on the United States. Section 202, which is entitled, "Effects of International Agreement," provides that once an international agreement enters into force the provision of the Act (H.R. 3350 and its regulations, where not inconsistent, shall continue in effect as to U.S. citizens.

However, this section does impose a duty on the Secretary (department unidentified). Yet even a breach of that duty would not give rise to a claim for compensation. The duty is set out in the second sentence of section 202:

"The Secretary in consultation with the Secretary of State, shall take all necessary measures to insure, to the maximum extent possible consistent with the provisions of such international agreements, that the integrity of investments previously made by United States citizens in connection with deep seabed mineral exploration and commercial recovery is protected in the implementation of such international agreement."

This language would appear to impose a duty upon the Secretary to make every effort to protect the investments previously made when implementing the international agreement—if such can be done under the terms of such international agreement. If the investments cannot be protected under the agreement then there is no breach of duty by the Secretary. The duty is in the "attempting" and not in the "accomplishing" of said protection. And there clearly is no language that implies compensation if the Secretary is unsuccessful in protecting the investments.

If, on the other hand, the Secretary is able to take measures that would protect the integrity of investments under the international agreement, then clearly he or she must do so under this language. However, failure to carry out that duty does not give rise to compensation since sovereign immunity is not waived. Rather the remedy would be in the nature of mandamus to compel the Secretary to carry out a prescribed duty. 28 U.S.C. 1361. The language of section 202 clearly does not authorize compensation under any circumstances.

In fact, the third sentence of section 202 implies that if compensation for loss of the value of investment is justified at all, Congress will make that decision at a later date; and on the basis of a report (which would include recommendations on compensation) which the Secretary is required to furnish to Congress. The third sentence of section 202 reads:

"The Secretary shall submit to the Congress, within one year . . . a report . . . which report shall include, but not be limited to—

* * * * *

"(2) . . . if applicable, the extent to which the value of their investments may have been impaired by the implementation of the international agreement; and

"(3) such recommendations as the Secretary finds are necessary to compensate United States citizens for such impairment." [Emphasis added.]

This language only requires a report on such impairment and recommendations as to how U.S. citizens could be compensated. It does not state that they will be compensated or that there is any right to be compensated—rather, it only requires that recommendations on the subject of compensation be submitted to Congress.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. UDALL. I rise to address a question to the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) concerning the reciprocating states section, section 107. I understand this is International Relations Committee language, so I would like the gentleman's interpretation on one point.

I notice that in subsection (c), on page 34, there is a requirement that the President "notify each reciprocating state of the receipt of any application for a license or permit under this title." But there is no reciprocal responsibility for the reciprocating state to notify the President of the receipt of applications. I am afraid this might encourage a reciprocating state, upon receiving our President's notice of an application by a U.S. firm, to encourage its own firms to apply for a license or permit for the same area. Such a reciprocating state could then grant the license or permit before we do, and preempt our company. What would the gentleman say in response to that?

[1] 299 U.S. at 319.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Ibid., at pp. 320–321.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman for bringing up that very important point. I would refer the gentleman to subsection (a)(3), on page 33. To designate a foreign nation as a reciprocating state, the President must determine that such foreign nation recognizes "priorities of right for application for licenses or permits which are consistent with those provided for in this title and the regulations issued thereunder." Under this criterion, I would think that in order to be designated a reciprocating state, a foreign nation would have to agree to notify the United States of applications by its companies, in order that priority of right could be established. I think that would take care of the gentleman's concern.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. JEFFORDS

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. JEFFORDS: Page 18, line 2, strike out "permit)" and insert "permit and information on the basis of which revisions are made, under section 105(a)(3), to the applicable final programmatic environmental impact statement)".

"(3) The Secretary in cooperation with the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency shall undertake a continuing review of the information obtained pursuant to section 106(b)(10)(C), as well as other pertinent information, and on the basis of any such information shall make such periodic revisions as may be necessary and appropriate to any final programmatic environmental impact statement prepared under paragraph (1) or (2).

Page 32, line 12, after "Secretary" insert "or the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency".

Page 32, line 13, strike out "the Secretary" and insert "each".

Page 35, strike out lines 12, 13 and 14, and insert the following:

(3) A summary of—

(A) the results of the monitoring conducted under subparagraph (A) of section 106(b)(10) with respect to environmental matters, and

(B) the environmental impact assessment made pursuant to subparagraph (C) of such section; and a description and estimate of any damage to the quality of the environment resulting from exploration and commercial recovery operations.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, these amendments are really not too dramatic, and yet they are significant. The purpose of them is only to insure that, as we move forward into this new area, we do make assurances that we adequately protect whatever impact we may have on the environment.

One of the amendments is a simple one in that it changes a word. That is, in respect to the work of the environmental impact statement, to substitute the word "cooperation" for "consultation." That is, the Secretary must not just consult, but must cooperate with EPA. That is an important substitution for this reason: I am sure all of those who have had the consultation route with the administration or bureaucracy knows what that means. It means they made up their mind what they are going to do, then they give you a phone call saying, "This is what we are going to do. What do you think?" You might say you do not like it, and they say, "Thank you, but that is what we are going to do." The difference is that this amendment would require that there be a memorandum of understanding which will require the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Commerce to work in concert on an environmental impact statement. I think that is significant. It still gives the lead to the Secretary. He has the final say, but it requires him to cooperate with the Environmental Protection Agency on the environmental impact statements.

The other parts of the amendments have to do, primarily, with the assurance that there is a continuing monitoring of the environmental impact related to deep seabed mining. Whereas now in known projects with respect to environmental impact statements we know generally where we are going in these areas. We make an impact statement and we make a decision. However in this novel area we do not really know what is going to happen, we do not know what the impact is going to be on the environment around that deep seabed mining, the changing sea environment. This will assure that there will be continuous monitoring, that the Environmental Protection Agency would have the right to obtain information from the licensee as to what is going on with respect to the water or the beds around the mine. It would allow the Secretary—and the Secretary, I point out, not the Environmental Protection Agency—to require changes in the license, depending upon whether or not it is determined there was such adverse impact that it would require changes with respect to the license.

The third part of the amendment is to merely insure that the report that is made by the Secretary adequately sets forth what happened with respect to the monitoring of the environmental impact, and it points out the duties of the Secretary reporting that aspect.

We have worked this out with the support of the staff.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not have any problems with the gentleman's amendments being considered en bloc, except the one, and I would like to make a little history of that, if I could.

The gentleman's amendment would require that the environmental impact statement be compiled by the administrative agency in cooperation with the Environmental Protection Agency rather than as now in the language, in consultation.

What I would want to avoid is a 2- or 3-headed monster. We need one lead agency. I think a lot of times industry has a real legitimate complaint that nobody is in charge. I assume that this strengthening language means the Environmental Protection Agency is going to have a little more important role in this process, but it does not do away with the idea that Commerce or Interior, or whatever agency is finally fixed as the lead agency, is in charge of the job, so that you have a single-headed operation.

Mr. JEFFORDS. That is exactly the intent; to leave it a single-headed operation, but to insure that, rather than a phone call, we will at least get a memorandum of understanding as to how the agencies will work together, as to what the input by EPA will be with the lead agency. The lead agency will still be Interior or Commerce, whatever the final decision is, but this will require more input and will require the actual input of information from EPA on a working basis rather than just a perfunctory phone call.

Mr. UDALL. With that assurance, Mr. Chairman, I will vote for the gentleman's amendment. We might win it four to three the way we are going here.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman talks about the philosophy of having that lead agency when in his amendment he says, at page 24, line 3, "Strike out 'consultation' and insert 'cooperation.'"

What does the gentleman mean by "cooperation"?

Mr. JEFFORDS. That is just what I believe we were trying to establish in the previous dialog. My understanding of what the word "cooperation" means comes from talking with members of the administration, and the Environmental Protection Agency, which has worked under a number of different agencies and a number of different situations with such memorandums. Let me give you examples:

There are numerous instances of cooperation between EPA and other Federal agencies in the preparation of environmental impact statements pursuant to section 102(2)(C) of the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969.

A prime example of this cooperation exists with the process employed by the EPA and the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. Both EPA and NRC have responsibilities pursuant to NEPA regarding the issuance of licenses or permits for nuclear powerplants and certain other facilities. Through a "memorandum of understanding" the two agencies have defined and clarified their respective roles in this process.

Other examples include:

The Pittston Oil Refinery in Maine.—The EIS was prepared with EPA as the lead agency, in cooperation primarily with the Corps of Engineers. Other agencies involved included the FAA, FEA, National Marine Fisheries Service, the Coast Guard, and the Fish and Wildlife Service.

The Hampton Roads Oil Refinery in Virginia.—Preparation of the EIS included again EPA, the Corps, National Marine Fisheries Service, and Fish and Wildlife Service.

Crosswater Barge Canal project, Florida.—EIS preparation with EPA, Corps of Engineers, Fish and Wildlife Service, National Marine Fisheries Service, and the State of Florida.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. JEFFORDS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. JEFFORDS. To continue, Mr. Chairman, what they do is this: The agency heads work out a memorandum of understanding as to what the input would be from EPA and how they would work together. It would not interfere with the lead agency.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. If the gentleman will yield further, where does this memorandum of understanding come from?

Mr. JEFFORDS. It is worked out between the agency heads. If there is any disagreement, of course, it is taken up in the normal hierarchy situation. The lead agency still would be the Secretary, in this case, the Secretary of Commerce; but they would be required to do more than just exercise their own discretion, that is to either ignore or consult with the EPA. The White House would of course have the final say.

This has been done in several instances other than those mentioned above which I could quote to the gentleman. This is not uncommon among agencies, and it has worked very well.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. What is wrong with consultation?

Mr. JEFFORDS. As I pointed out earlier, consultation merely means that one is supposed to call somebody and ask, if he wants to, what the other person's views are. However, at least under bureaucratic terminology, as I understand it, there is no requirement to listen to, work with, or do anything other than engage in some perfunctory consultation, whereas in the bureaucratic terminology, cooperation means that they actually have to work together; but the lead agency still would be the Secretary of Commerce.

I would not want it any other way. I, too, would not want to see a dual-headed monster.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. We do not know whether there would be a dual-headed monster or a snail darter, but we are now confronted with this multi-agency mix in virtually everything we do.

In this legislation we very clearly wrote in what I felt were very strong environmental controls and protection, and I think the gentleman takes away the lead agency responsibility and confuses it.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Finally, the amendments would broaden the environmental impact information required to be submitted by the Secretary in the annual report to Congress. It would simply require that we receive information on the results of the monitoring, in addition to an assessment of any damage to the quality of the environment.

JUSTIFICATION FOR EPA INVOLVEMENT

EPA has extensive jurisdiction and experience in regulating ocean environment activities. In its traditional role of preserving and protecting the quality of water from pollution, EPA has developed effluent limitation guidelines, standards of performance, and pretreatment standards for land-based industrial processes. In addition, under the Clean Water Act (section 403) EPA has established criteria for ocean discharges and regulates discharges from exploratory drilling vessels, drilling platforms, and other offshore drilling facilities located seaward of the territorial sea through permits issued pursuant to the national pollutant discharge elimination system (NPDES). Under the Marine Protection, Research, and Sanctuaries Act of 1972, EPA is engaged in developing criteria to allow environmentally safe disposition of material into all ocean waters, and to conduct site specific baseline surveys of ocean dumping sites. EPA also provides technical advice to the Federal on-scene coordinators when oil spills occur in ocean waters.

POTENTIAL ENVIRONMENTAL IMPACTS OF DEEP SEABED MINING

The environmental impacts of deep seabed mining are potentially quite extensive. While the deep ocean mining environmental study (DOMES) project being conducted by NOAA indicates, at this point, that mining activities may not significantly degrade the marine environment, we have had no full-scale commercial recovery operations going on. The Merchant Marine Committee has noted in their report that the impacts are unpredictable and cannot actually be determined until a substantial amount of evidence is accumulated. However, these impacts may include destruction of marine life and disruption of their environment, sediment resuspension and settling, transplantation of bethnic organisms—benthos, organisms that live on or in the ocean bottom—increased suspended solids in the water column, discharge of heavy metals, and the possibility of toxic components in bottom waters discharged at the surface.

If there is shipboard processing of the mineral nodules, there could be further impacts including process water discharge, and potential ocean dumping of toxic quantities of mercury, cadmium, zinc, copper, and nickel. Additionally, preliminary research indicates that depending upon the size, depth and duration of the activities, the migration patterns of tuna and other fish may be affected by mining operations.

In sum, I believe that given the potential wide range of environmental impacts of ocean mining, and the Environmental Protection Agency's authorizations and expertise in the ocean environment, that it is only prudent and wise to have that agency play an adequate role in assessing the environmental impacts of ocean mining.

I believe these amendments are constructive and would improve the protective features of this bill. I hope my colleagues will support me in this effort.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the reason I have some concern about the gentleman's amendment, and the reason I cannot support it is that I think what we are doing is creating a dual administration as far as at least one aspect of this whole project is concerned. That is the environmental consequences.

Mr. Chairman, I have two objections to that. No. 1, the GAO report we had before our committee recommended that one department be the lead agency and that someone have the authority to make the decisions. In doing that, we provided that he consult with the Environmental Protection Agency. "Consult" is a word of art. It means they have to sit down and listen to each other and work out together the problems they see. However, if the Department of Commerce, which is the lead agency, does not agree with it, they have to make the hard decision and then agree.

In addition to that, if we look at the track record on environment as far as oceans are concerned, we have to admit that EPA does not have the necessary expertise in that area. The Department of Commerce has done a deep ocean mining environmental study. They have taken the lead and have spent a great deal of money and time and effort in trying to assess the environmental consequences of deep ocean mining.

EPA has not done that. EPA does not have any vessels, equipment, or training or expertise in ocean environment.

I think we tried it once before in the Ocean Dumping Act, when we tried to give this dual chain of command to them. We found it did not work and found that the different agencies were fighting and that nothing was being accomplished.

I think the proper setup is to have the Department of Commerce as the lead agency to act in consultation with the Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to voice my support of the position stated by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX). I am really concerned about this amendment.

It seems to me that the word "consultation" does call for a good deal of working together between the two agencies. Certainly if EPA feels that they are not getting a fair shake or are not being listened to, it has access to the press. In fact, as everyone knows, their complaints certainly have received widespread attention.

I think that by putting the word "cooperation" in the bill, we are almost giving EPA veto power. If one agency refuses to move or if cooperation is not forthcoming from an agency, it seems to me that EPA could exercise an outright veto.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that it seems to me the word "consultation" does the job, whereas the word "cooperation" would give EPA a veto under this particular provision.

Also, as the gentleman who preceded me has said, NOAA has done a good job in the environmental area. There is no reason to believe that they would not do a good job in terms of mining the deep seabed.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know if the gentleman only objects as to this provision, and whether or not he would object to separating that out and voting on that separately. Would he then be willing to accept the other parts?

Mr. BREAUX. I have not read the other parts. This disturbed me so much that I decided not to support the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS).

The question was taken and the Chairman being in doubt, the Committee divided, and there were—ayes 8; noes 8.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair votes aye.

So the amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BINGHAM

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BINGHAM: Page 33, line 24, insert "sufficient" after "a".

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think this can be fairly described as a technical amendment. One of the qualifications that was in the language recommended by the International Relations Committee for reciprocating states was that each state establish a special fund for the payment of contributions to an international regime. As a matter of fact, this is a fairly important requirement, and one that would not be likely satisfied by states that were not serious about going into the mining business.

My amendment at this point simply would add the word "sufficient". It would then be up to the determination of the President in consultation with the Secretaries and the heads of the other appropriate departments to determine whether the fund was sufficient, and whether the reciprocating state satisfied the other requirements of section 107.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I agree with the gentleman's explanation of the amendment, and certainly support it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MRS. FENWICK

Mrs. FENWICK. Mrs. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mrs. FENWICK: On page 36, at line 7, delete "recognize the rights of" and insert in lieu thereof, "allow".

On page 36, at lines 12 and 13, delete "substantially the same" and insert in lieu thereof "similar".

On page 36, at line 17, delete "materially" and insert in lieu thereof, "unreasonably".

On page 37, at line, 23, after the work "extent" add the word "reasonably".

On page 38, at line 15, delete "substantially the same" and insert in lieu thereof "similar".

On page 38, at line 17, after the word "been" add the word "unreasonably".

Mrs. FENWICK (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I distributed copies of the amendments to the various desks, and, I think, to most of the Members in the Chamber, there being so few. I do not think they need reading unless anyone would like to have them read.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, this is more in the form of a courtesy amendment, removing some of the buzz words that might offend other nations and make consultation and cooperation with them more difficult. It inserts little courtesy phrases that suggest that we are not arrogant, we not indifferent, that we are cooperating and acting in good faith.

It is really an effort, as the Members will see when they read it, just to have a little bit more courtesy and civility in our international relations. I would be happy to answer any questions concerning it. I would like to hear how the gentlemen on both sides of the aisle feel about this.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. Of course I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I regretfully have to indicate opposition to the gentlewoman's amendment. The language contained in the so-called grandfather clause, which is the area of the bill the gentlewoman's amendment covers, was worked out as a compromise among three committees with rather differing points of view to start with.

Mrs. FENWICK. I know.

Mr. BINGHAM. And without indicating whether I would personally favor the gentlewoman's amendment, I have to indicate that it would upset the nature of the compromise and, therefore, I have to oppose it.

Mrs. FENWICK. Could I ask the gentleman if we could hear from the gentlemen who represent the other committees? As I understand, it is not a strong personal objection, but the gentleman from New York (Mr. BINGHAM) feels bound by the compromise worked out with the other committees.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is right.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from New Jersey yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. MURPHY).

Mr. MURPHY of New York. As the gentlewoman knows, certainly I am reluctant ever to engage in a conflict with the gentlewoman from New Jersey, but I think the amendment, as we have studied the amendment the gentlewoman has offered, hurts the intent of the grandfather provision.

Mrs. FENWICK. The gentleman does? Does it hurt it?

Mr. MURPHY of New York. I think we have worked out an equitable and agreeable provision that I know had satisfied all of the problem areas amongst the four committees, and I think that this violates that agreement.

Mrs. FENWICK. What troubled me was on page 36, line 7, where we say "recognize the rights of U.S. citizens" and I would merely suggest that we say "allow the U.S. citizens who have undertaken" such agreements to continue their operations under substantially the same arrangement.

In other words, it was to avoid a word like "rights" which might worry other people, but at the same time we are saying the Secretary shall allow these people who have entered into those agreements to continue to do so lawfully under regulations of title I, and so on. It is just a kind of courtesy. If the gentleman feels he can support it, I will sit down. If he feels terribly strongly against it. I will keep standing.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

The amendments, as I understand, refer to page 36, line 7, where we would delete "recognize the rights of" and insert the word "allow". Then on line 12 the amendments would delete the words "substantially the same" and insert "similar". On line 17 we would delete "materially" and insert "unreasonably".

Mrs. FENWICK. That is right.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. And then the gentlewoman would on line 23 after the word "extent" add the word "reasonably".

On page 38, line 15, she would change by deleting the words "substantially the same" and inserting "similar". Then on line 17 after the word "been" she would add the word "unreasonably".

I do not think there is anything unreasonable about these amendments, and I think they are substantially similar to the bill itself, but I think she does raise the point that at least the amendment eliminates a possible flag or opposition that could be a knee-jerk reaction. If we are not serious, I do not know what the problem is or what delicate balance it would upset.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman should study very carefully the language changes because they substantially change the intent.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman will yield further, what is the difference between "substantially the same" and "similar"? What is the difference there? I mean, that is one of the changes. Now recognizing the difference between "rights" and "allow", there is a little difference there, but I think that is similar to or substantially the same. What is the difference? I am serious about this.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) has expired.

(On request of Mr. JOHN L. BURTON, and by unanimous consent, Mrs. FENWICK was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX) likes the amendments.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. I am not sure.

I would ask, through the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) to the chairman, what is the difference between substantially the same and similar, except that it eliminates using potentially buzz words or something of a triggering device?

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman will yield, they are substantially the same.

Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. They are similar in nature. I think we ought to allow them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman has again expired.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, just very briefly, although all of the words may sound alike, and they basically are regularly in use, as we know them and use them today, but they are also words used in the art. They are words we have been working with the Law-of-the-Sea Conference for years, and they are the result of words recommended by the administration, and by Ambassador Elliot Richardson, and we should not allow anything to happen with regard to something that has been worked out over the years, and is a very delicate part in the negotiating sessions.

There is a difference between them. I am not going to belabor the point, but there is a significant difference betwen the words that could cause us to change our position in the negotiating sessions.

Although the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) has suggested that on its face it would not do damage nevertheless, it would do damage.

I repeat, these are words we have been using in our negotiations. They are words of art and they are words that we are using in our negotiating sessions.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman would yield, could the gentleman please explain to us what the significant differences are?

Mr. BREAUX. They would be a departure from the position we have held for 10 years. All of a sudden we are using different language in the type of treaty that we could expect to improve when it comes back to the Congress. We have been using them for 10 years, and these would represent a change, a turnover and could do damage in the international negotiations and to the Congress.

I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, an effort has been made by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) and by others, to try to improve this bill. I must say it is a lot better than the bill we were initially presented with when it reached the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs.

But, Mr. Chairman, I think the gentlewoman is making a really basic point, whatever the particular problems may be with the precise words.

In 1970 the United Nations unanimously, and with the affirmative vote of the United States, adopted a declaration which contains the following language:

> The seabed and ocean floor, and subsoil thereof, beyond the limits of national jurisdiction (hereinafter referred to as the area), as well as the resources of the area, are the common heritage of mankind. The area shall not be subject to appropriation by any means, by States or persons, natural or juridicial, and no State shall claim or exercise sovereignty or sovereign rights over any part thereof.

That last sentence really has two parts: it says that no State shall claim or exercise sovereignty or sovereign rights over any part of the deep ocean floor. This bill, by asserting that the United States can license private corporations to mine part of the ocean floor, could be construed as an attempt to exercise sovereign rights over part of the deep ocean floor. The other part of the sentence says that the area shall not be subject to appropriation by any means, by States or persons, natural or juridicial. But if a corporation is unilaterally licensed by the United States, and if it proceeds to remove part of the deep ocean bed, it seems to me it could be construed as a form of appropriation.

So, Mr. Chairman, I am going to vote against this bill. It not only violates the spirit, if not the letter, of that declaration, which the United States supported and which was adopted without a dissenting vote in 1970. But, and this is equally important, it may well jeopardize the conclusion of the Law of the Sea Treaty which is in the process of negotiation. Most of the basic issues have been resolved already by the Law of the Sea Conference, I do not see why we cannot put this whole matter off until the next Congress, and give the conference time to complete its work. If it does not complete it by this time next year, then the next Congress will still have plenty of time to decide what to do.

But I suggest we are making a very wrong decision and one that we will come to regret if we destroy the possibility of working out such a treaty with the other countries of the world. If that should happen, then I say to my colleagues that an area which is seven-eighths of the world's surface will be increasingly a source of potentially serious conflict and even war, as more and more nations assert the same rights that we would be asserting in this treaty, and without any agreed upon international regime to prevent such conflicts.

The Department of Defense says that the minerals on the deep seabed are not essential for our stockpiles at the present time. So there is no need for haste, particularly in view of the risk of jeopardizing the Law of the Sea Treaty.

So I think the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK), should be commended for her effort in trying to at least take some of the sting out of the language of the bill.

Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. RUPPE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I agree with the gentleman's last comment in particular, and I think that the language that the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK) has offered does take a bit of the sting out of the language in the bill. Certainly it is really in our interest to encourage a treaty to come out of the Law of the Sea Conference, and to the extent that the language offered by the gentlewoman moves in that direction and is suggestive of a U.S. interest in arranging an international agreement and coming to a settlement of the group of 77, it seems to me it is very advisable for us to support the amendment that she is offering.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I certainly agree with what the gentleman says.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. FENWICK).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BREAUX) there were—ayes 13, noes 8.

So the amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MILLER OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER of California: Page 32, after line 16 insert the following:

"(c) The Secretary may at any time amend regulations established under subsections (a) and (b) of this Section as he determines to be necessary and appropriate in order to provide for the conservation of natural resources, protection of the environment, and the safety of life and property at sea. Such regulations shall apply to all operations conducted under any license or permit issued or maintained under the provisions of this Act and shall be in furtherance of the policies of this Act. The Secretary shall hold at least one public hearing on any such proposed amendment."

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to make sure that when the Secretary promulgates regulations at a later date, perhaps after deep sea mining has begun, those regulations would apply in a retroactive fashion. This is the same type of language and the same provisions that we have just finished putting into the legislation dealing with offshore oil drilling on the Outer Continental Shelf. It is not a new standard. It was first written in the OCS Act of 1953 and was reaffirmed in the most recent amendments that the conference committee has just completed.

The stipulation has also been contained in all the coal leases issued by the Department of the Interior since 1967. What it really says is that if we would give the ability to the Secretary to go back and to fine tune those regulations and to bring under the jurisdiction of those regulations on-going operations, I do not think that it is subject to the criticism that somehow we would be allowing the Secretary to overregulate this industry. In fact, it would perhaps allow them to modify and make more reasonable those regulations, so I think that as a matter of consistency where we do have leases or licenses let on a periodic basis, where they are not all let at one single time, this amendment allows us to have the consistency of regulation and the consistency of administration over the many and varied operations wherever they may take place. With that short explanation, I would ask the committee to support the amendment.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. UDALL. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I think this is an acceptable amendment. These are going to be very large operations, and in many cases that means a decade or so to complete the operation. To say that once the Secretary has made regulations for that particular operation, he is stuck with those regulations forever makes no great sense. It seems to me industry would even be for this amendment because they might well persuade the Secretary that the regulations are too harsh and ought to be changed.

Mr. MILLER of California. I certainly agree with the gentleman. I think it could be very clear that we could learn a great deal from the first license where we would want to change the regulations, and in the second one to make it easier to carry out the license for which it was granted.

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, this is similar to provisions of the Coal Leasing Act and the Outer Continental Shelf Act.

Mr. MILLER of California. That is correct.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER of California. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. BREAUX. If the gentleman will yield further, I would like to ask a question on this. We had an amendment by the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS) that this committee defeated. That was because it provided for the conservation of natural resources language that I had some problems with, as well as some others.

The gentleman's amendment also says that the Secretary will be able to issue regulations at any time in order to provide for the conservation of natural resources. The same questions I asked the other gentleman from California I would like to ask the gentleman in the well. I am really concerned, as are others, that it would allow the Secretary to say you could mine cobalt, but not manganese, and allow the Secretary to issue regulations that say you must continue mining when it is no longer profitable. Those are some of my concerns.

I see the same language of the other amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. KREBS).

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman knows, that would certainly not be the legislative intent behind this amendment. The legislative intent would be to have this language used in the same manner in which it is used in the Outer Continental Shelf Act and in the same manner it was used in the coal leasing legislation; that is, we do it in the most reasonable manner possible.

The purpose of this legislation, let us not forget, is to mine those minerals that are outlined in the legislation.

In terms of conservation of natural resources, I would suspect that this should be used as a tool to limit the taking of those minerals that will be subject to the license, not to this procedure.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman another question. The gentleman assures me that the intent of the gentleman's amendment when the gentleman talks about additional regulations to provide for the conservation of natural resources would not allow the Secretary to set up what we refer to as a production control system, which is something that we very strongly oppose.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, again that would not be the intent of this legislation. I think if that was what the Secretary sought to accomplish, that is something he would have to accomplish simply through the licensing procedure. That is not the intent of this legislation.

Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Chairman, I am pleased with that information. My only comment is that we tried to address it in committee on the compromise language before us. We tried to set up two points of procedure. First, they come in and get a license to explore.

Second, if you come back to the Secretary for a permit for the exploration, he makes a new set of regulations for production. That should give the Secretary, in my opinion, time enough to set up a series of regulations.

I really do not think this is necessary, but with the other assurances of the gentleman, I do not object to the amendment.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREAUX. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentleman's amendment, the gentleman is trying to give the Secretary the same authority he has today over the mining of other minerals.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, that is absolutely correct.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am concerned about this retroactivity, only because a company could be hard hit after making the enormous upfront expenditures necessary to get into the deep sea mining business, upon reliance on the regulations that existed at the time they first became engaged in it.

We are talking about a 5- to a 10-year timeframe to get going in the business. We are talking about expenditures that may go up to $200 million or $250 million, a quarter of a billion dollars, before the first return on capital is seen.

Considering the fact that this bill is designed to liberate American industry to move forward into deep sea mining until such time as we end the current stalemate and deadlock between the developing world and ourselves as to the terms and conditions of exploiting the resources of the deep seabed, it seems to me that this amendment might have a dampening effect, and a throttling effect that is inconsistent with the very purpose of the bill.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHEUER. Yes, of course, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to explain the experience we have had in the OCS. On single leases companies have expended tens of millions of dollars to get the right to drill. In some leases they will spend a quarter of a billion dollars just to build a rig in some of the frontier areas in Alaska. They will be subject to the same provision and to the same regulations.

What this really says is that if we find a safer way of doing business, we may allow them to do that. We are saying, "If you can prove to us it is less expensive and just as safe to do it in another manner, we can modify the regulations as we see fit." It gives us flexibility.

Otherwise, when we get to questions as to this technology, whenever we are going to have these matters as issues, we are going to have to fight these fights in Congress rather than give the flexibility to the Secretary on these matters.

Mr. Chairman, this is a matter of gaining experience. We really do not know what we will do in this case, so I do not think this will have a dampening effect.

Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman is right. In any event, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12988, formerly H.R. 3350, the Deep Seabed Hard Mineral Resources Act, of which I am a cosponsor.

The time has come to allow U.S. citizens to carry out the exploration and commercial recovery of seabed minerals.

In April 1977, the House Science and Technology Subcommittee on Domestic and International Scientific Planning, Analysis, and Cooperation, which I chair, reviewed the status of the U.N. Law of the Sea (LOS) Conference negotiations. A major concern during our hearings was the manner in which the LOS Conference would affect the conduct of oceanographic research. Potential limitations on the publication of research results as well as unreasonable coastal state restrictions on research conducted within the 200-mile economic zone were identified as several critical dangers to scientific freedom. Based on the testimony, our subcommittee concluded its review with several policy recommendations aimed at maintaining vital United States, as well as global, interests regarding the freedom to conduct marine research.

Additionally, our subcommittee focused on certain technology transfer aspects involved in deep seabed mining. Testimony from a number of witnesses revealed that issues concerning the system of access to the seabed, as well as the resource policy to guide and regulate seabed mineral production, have made very difficult the establishment of a negotiated international regime governing ocean mining.

In light of this difficulty, witnesses proposed that domestic seabed mining legislation be enacted to insure U.S. development of this promising natural resource. After considering the testimony, our subcommittee recommended, at that time, that legislation should be enacted if the negotiations at the sixth LOS session "clearly indicated an inability of Conference participants to reach an international agreement on seabed exploitation."

Almost a year has now passed since my subcommittee's review. Today, Conference delegates continue to debate the seabed mining issue.

The latest session of the Conference in Geneva recently ended with little actual documented agreement regarding the economic exploitation of seabed minerals. Although I hope to see substantial progress during the next LOS session scheduled for August of this year, I sincerely doubt that an early resolution of the critical points of difference will be reached on this issue, or whether any further progress can be achieved by the U.S. delegation on the issue of marine scientific research.

I support U.S. participation in the Conference, which is a very ambitious endeavor of the global community, and am convinced that a treaty arising from that Conference is in the best interest of our country. However, to insure the timely U.S. development of the deep seabed resources, I support the passage of H.R. 3350.

Such legislative action is not, in my opinion, inconsistent with continued participation in the LOS negotiations for several reasons. First, the legislation is transitional in nature, pending the adoption of an international regime. Second, it asserts no sovereignty over any area of the seabed, and is consistent with high seas freedoms as established by the 1958 Convention on the High Seas. Third, the bill establishes a revenue sharing fund for U.S. contributions to an international fund, in recognition of the common heritage character of these resources pursuant to an international agreement regarding the precise conditions of their exploration. Under this legislation, if no international agreement is achieved in 10 years, Congress will then decide the ultimate disposition of this fund.

Mr. Chairman, this is carefully considered legislation with broad ramifications for the concept of global consensus and international resource policy and I urge its adoption.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. MILLER).

The amendment was agreed to.

● Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to indicate my strong support for the Deep Seabed Minerals Resources Act under consideration in the House today. I was one of the original proponents and sponsors of this legislation, which I introduced early in this decade. The passage of time has only served to intensify the importance of enacting deep seabed mining legislation, and I urge this House to vote affirmatively.

The United States has a critical need from a strategic and economic standpoint for a secure, long-term supply of minerals not available from domestic sources. Over the past decade, U.S. mining companies have developed the sophisticated technology necessary to recover and process mineral nodules located on the ocean floor. The potential of these new mineral resources for our Nation's industrial growth and future security is practically limitless. With proper development and management, the deep seabed will constitute a major world source and would help to provide some degree of stability to world metal prices.

The development and use of the mineral resources of the deep seabed have been the subject of extensive and delicate deliberations by the Law of the Sea Conference. Having had both the privilege and the frustration of participating in the law of the sea for a considerable period of time, I feel I can speak with some authority in this area. Ideally, the question of deep seabed mining should be a part of an overall international agreement on the use of oceans and ocean resources. Unfortunately, despite a herculean effort by United States and other negotiators, the industrialized and developing nations have reached what seems to be an irresolvable impasse. We have postponed congressional action on deep seabed mining legislation since the 92d Congress in order to give the Law of the Sea Conference an opportunity to reach international agreement. In view of the continuing gloomy prospect for any type of acceptable agreement, I do not feel that we can wait any longer. Hopefully, a comprehensive international agreement is still in the cards; in the interim, however, we need this legislation to protect our own interests, and I urge a favorable vote.●

Mr. PRITCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Stark amendment, which would raise the level of contributions assessed to ocean mining companies from three-fourths of 1 percent to 10 percent of gross revenues. I understand Mr. Stark's concerns about the need to establish a meaningful revenue sharing fund which is based on the recognition of the concept of "the common heritage of mankind," as represented by deep seabed minerals. In addition, I share his concerns that perhaps the level of contributions could be somewhat higher. In fact, during our Subcommittee on Oceanography deliberations, I urged that the revenue sharing fund be established at a level of 2 percent of gross revenues as compared to three-fourths of 1 percent. However, that amendment lost and in subsequent negotiations, in order to actually establish the fund, it was necessary to require contributions at a relatively moderate level.

Although many others would like to see somewhat higher levels of contributions, I do feel that the Stark amendment is simply too high in that it would reduce the rate of return on investment a substantial 20 percent, based on the MIT model which simulated an average-scale ocean mining operation. This level of contribution could deter investment in what is an already uncertain and high-risk enterprise. Therefore, given the modified closed rule on this issue, which prevents anything between three-fourths of 1 percent and 10 percent of gross revenues as the level of contributions, I must oppose the Stark amendment. In addition, one of the problems with this proposed formula for revenue sharing is that it is simply based on gross revenues, regardless of profitability. In Ambassador Richardson's financing proposals, at the Law of the Sea Conference he has suggested a mixed form of revenue sharing contributions which would include contributions based on gross revenues, a one-time entry or license fee, and, most importantly, contributions based upon profit. This latter approach would at least allow the development of seabed minerals before substantial front-end burdens are imposed. Given the great uncertainty and risk in ocean mining, it seems to me that little investment will occur without a sound and rational development of precise revenue sharing principles. Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that the Stark amendment represents such a formula.

Mr. LEGGETT. Mr. Chairman, as we have known for many years, the ocean bottom is laden with vast quantities of manganese nodules, rich not only in manganese but also nickle, cooper, cobalt, and other valuable minerals. With growing domestic demand for metals, development of deep ocean mining technology has experienced parallel growth leading to heightened interest in tapping this vital resource.

The United States has a critical strategic and economic need for a secure and extended supply of these four metals in particular, since we are currently dependent upon imports to meet our present demands.

I believe it is necessary to expedite our development of a policy which would enable immediate access to these minerals. Currently, we are importing 71 percent of our nickle, 15 percent of our copper, and nearly 100 percent of our manganese and cobalt from abroad. According to a Department of Defense study of the 15 most critical minerals, most susceptible to supply disruptions due to the political instability of the exporting nations, manganese ranks 2d, cobalt 11th, and nickel 15th. In 1976 alone, the United States spent $1.8 billion importing these minerals, lending strong evidence that a policy of self-sufficiency in this area is vital.

As my colleagues know, manganese, nickle, and cobalt are indispensible in the aerospace, electrical, and steel industries. As an example, for every ton of steel produced, 13 to 20 pounds of manganese ore is consumed. Without a dependable source of manganese and other metals, industrial output could decline sharply, our defense capability would be damaged, and millions of jobs could be lost.

With these facts in mind, I believe that H.R. 12988 should be strengthened to require U.S. permittees to document their mining and processing vessels under the laws of the United States. Having these vessels under the U.S. flag will assure regulation of the nodule harvesting from the deep ocean floor. This will insure an adequate supply of mineral resources for our industries by lessening our foreign dependency while safeguarding environmental quality as well. Among other benefits U.S. ownership and control of vessels used in the mining process will insure American scientific monitoring and assesment of the mining impact to the surrounding marine environment.

Equally important, in my view, is adoption of the amendment offered by my colleagues, Chairman JOHN MURPHY and Congressman JOHN BREAUX, due to its potential for generating tax revenue and because of the employment opportunities it affords to American workers.

Furthermore, I am supportive of yet another amendment offered by Chairman MURPHY and Congressman BREAUX which would require each permittee to use a minimum of one vessel documented under the laws of the United States for the transportation of minerals recovered from the mine sites. Estimates are that between two and four ore carriers will be needed at each mining site to transport the recovered minerals to the processing facilities.

Thus, an amendment of this type would guarantee some United States control over the vessels needed to transport a significant portion for our strategically important hard minerals, while not imposing restrictions on foreign entities wishing to employ their own flag vessels. In addition, this amendment appropriately encourages growth of a United States flag bulk fleet, thus reducing the Nation's dependence on foreign-flag vessels for mineral transport, while also reducing the U.S. balance of payments deficit and the drain on the dollar.

The Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act provides for three-fourths of 1 percent of the annual receipts to be deposited into a Deep Seabed Revenue Sharing Trust Fund to be shared with the Third World countries. I am of the belief that this rate is appropriate and well balanced, as the bill's primary objective is to encourage private investment in deep seabed mining ventures. To raise the tax rate to 10 percent would tend to discourage maximum private investment, and hence prevent us from reaching our development potential. The tax rate set forth in H.R. 12988 not only provides the necessary incentive for private investment but also is evidence of United States good faith to the international community that we intended to share the proceeds of this endeavor once a suitable treaty is signed.

With respect to agency jurisdiction over mining operations of this type, the Commerce Department has had considerable experience in deep seabed mining projects and their environmental repercussions. Because it has been conducting the preliminary environmental assessment effort known as the Deep Ocean Mining Environmental Study (DOMES) project since fiscal year 1975, the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA) is the obvious and logical choice to govern these mineral extraction activities. The Commerce Department's experience in the administration of programs that have important foreign policy implications further lends support to the placement of seabed mining within this agency's jurisdiction.

If this legislation is enacted today, it will take an extended period of 5 years until the mining companies are ready to operate commercially. In the interim, they will be active in determining mine site locations and testing their gathering and processing systems.

The Deep Seabed Hard Minerals Act would authorize initiation of ocean mining operations without unnecessary delay. This legislation must be enacted now for the United States to capitalize upon the sophisticated technology it has already spent millions of dollars to develop.

The mineral resources of the deep seabed could play a significant future role in preserving economic well-being and security in an era of growing resource scarcity. Ocean mining presents the United States with the opportunity to strengthen its national defense, improve its balance of payments posture, and provide new employment opportunities for thousands of Americans.

I regret that the Law of the Sea Conference has not been able to come to an agreement as yet, but we must consider the future and provide a stable framework within which ocean mining can proceed. H.R. 12988 can provide this stability and bring new momentum toward successful completion of the international negotiations.●

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, the question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. BREAUX), as amended.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SIMON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3350) to promote the orderly development of hard mineral resources in the deep seabed, pending adoption of an international regime relating thereto, pursuant to House Resolution 1240, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole to the amendment in the nature of a substitute? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 312, nays 80, not voting 40, as follows:

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks and include extraneous matter on the bill, H.R. 3350, just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I inadvertently missed the last vote on final passage of the bill on the mining of the ocean floor. Had I been present I would have voted "aye."

PERMISSION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE ON COAST GUARD AND NAVIGATION OF COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE ON JULY 27 AND 28

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Subcommittee on Coast Guard and Navigation of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may be permitted to sit on Thursday and Friday, July 27 and 28, 1978, during the 5-minute rule, for the purpose of holding hearings, and hearings alone, on the bill, H.R. 10371.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman from New York can assure us there will be no markup of legislation?

Mr. BIAGGI. Absolutely.

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I just want to commend the gentleman from New York (Mr. BIAGGI) for his diligence, fortitude, and stamina.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so only to inquire of the Chair as to the program for the balance of the evening and when the end might be, if he will tell us.

The SPEAKER. The House will take up H.R. 7577, Economic Opportunity and Community Services Amendments, on which we have completed the rule and on which we have completed general debate, and upon conclusion of this legislation we will adjourn until tomorrow.

Mr. BAUMAN. We will stay until we finish the bill?

The SPEAKER. We anticipate we will stay, yes. The Chair is very hopeful that we will be through with this bill within an hour.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the Chair and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ECONOMIC OPPORTUNITY AND COMMUNITY SERVICES AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 7577) to amend the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. ANDREWS).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 7577, with Mr. OBERSTAR, in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on Monday, July 24, 1978, all time for general debate on the bill had expired. Pursuant to the rule, the Clerk will now read the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Education and Labor now printed in the bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Economic Opportunity and Community Services Amendments of 1978".

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 904. There are authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this title such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1979 and for each of the two succeeding fiscal years.".

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. PERKINS

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PERKINS: Page 27, line 25, strike out "is" and insert in lieu thereof "would be".

Page 28, line 1, insert after "year" the following: "(if no funds were made available to any State under this subparagraph for such fiscal year)".

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer is purely a clarifying amendment. There has been a good deal of confusion and controversy over the interpretation of the existing Head Start formula and this bill attempts to resolve that problem.

Now HEW has raised a question as to the meaning of the new formula in this bill. In my judgment, there really should be no question. The floor debate and the committee report clearly state what is intended.

I do not want there to be any future controversies however, and, accordingly, I am offering this purely clarifying amendment. It does not change in any way the formula the committee agreed to, which I would again like to explain.

First, the Secretary reserves 13 percent of the amount appropriated for allotment to the territories and for discretionary use.

Second, each State receives an amount equal to the amount it received in the previous fiscal year. This is in effect a floating hold harmless.

Third, most States will be provided with a cost-of-living increase of 6 percent. As projected only three States will not receive the 6 percent. These are the States whose hold harmless amounts are over 200 percent more than what they would receive if all of the money were allocated solely on the basis of the formula. The clarifying amendment I have offered deals with this feature of the new distribution formula, and simply clarifies the fact that the measurement of whether a State qualifies for the 6 percent is the formula allocation without regard to the hold harmless and the 6 percent.

Finally, the remaining sums are allocated to the States on the basis of the formula so that all States share in any expansion money.

I urge adoption of the amendment.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, we agree with the amendment on this side.

Mr. PERKINS. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GOODLING

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOODLING: Page 22, beginning with line 25, strike out everything through line 6 on page 23.

Page 23, line 7, strike out "(2)" and insert in lieu thereof "(3)".

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the letters you received at home from the different agencies indicated to you that you should in fact go for the 80–20 and not support my amendment which says 60–40, because those agencies thought, and probably still do think, that they are going to get more money from the Federal Government and if they get more money from the Federal Government that would offset what they in fact are now getting from their local and State effort. Unfortunately, I think that is foolish thinking on their part.

If you look at the record over the years for 1972, 1973, 1975, 1976, and 1977, the appropriations for these programs stayed exactly the same. Last year there was a slight increase which really did not even cover cost of living or inflation.

Knowing the mood of the Congress at the present time and realizing the mood throughout the country, I cannot imagine that the Committee on Appropriations is going to be so generous as to come up with a 20-percent increase to offset what they are going to lose on the local effort level if we go to 80–20.

So, basically, I think my chairman, when we were holding hearings in Atlanta, Ga., put his finger on what my amendment is really all about, and I quote from my chairman's comments in Atlanta.

> But the matter of whether to put in 80–20 or 75–25—my point is that the Appropriations Committee probably has no interest. I expect what we are going to get for this program is pretty much already destined. I doubt there is much we can do about that. So if we change to 80–20 in this bill, you probably aren't going to get any more Federal money, you are just going to get less total money for the program. I believe most all of you are thinking if you get 80–20, you get more money for the program. I think you get less. The Federal share is going to be the same either way. And yet you are going to get less local, so you get less total.

I think that is the thing we have to consider this evening. If we, in fact, want to reduce the amount of money that these agencies will have to help the poor back in our local districts, I think the way to go is to go 80–20, because if they do not get one more penny, or even if they get a cost-of-living increase from the Federal Government, they are going to lose 20 percent from the local effort, which will mean they will have that much less money. They are either going to have to cut programs or they are going to have to fire personnel. I think it is just as simple as that, and we have to make sure then that we understand that the program will be cut. If the Members support the program, it will definitely have to be cut. If we go the 80–20 route, because there will be no—as my chairman stated—extra dollars from the Federal level, some people will give us the argument that they could not raise the 40 percent locally. That in many instances just is not true.

Again in my chairman's area, he has a joint Orange-Chatham County Action, Inc. They put up 60 percent, not the 40 that they designated. In the Wake County Opportunities, they put up the 45 percent, not the 40. In the Operation Breakthrough they put up 25 percent, but we have a very, very liberal provision which permits the director to waive the 40 percent. Last year he waived it 288 times with no inconvenience whatsoever. So I think we very definitely have to give serious thought to what is going to happen to these 800 and some Caa's if, for instance, we take the in-kind contributions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GOODLING was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. GOODLING. Some will say that a lot of these contributions are in kind and, as was pointed out at the hearings and as my chairman said, there is probably some cheating in that in-kind business, and there is no question about that. I am sure that if some communities give a building, they probably say that the rental is maybe twice as much as it really is. But think about that for a minute Suppose they now decide, since they only have to contribute 20 percent, that one of the areas they will reduce is, they will take away the facilities that they are giving in kind. That means that these agencies have to in fact go out and rent. They are already going to get less money because they are not going to get any more from the Federal Government; they are going to get less from the local effort. Now they must go out on their own and rent facilities, which is going to delete getting money for the very people we said we are trying to help.

There is a philosophical argument, too, of course. We found through the sixties, particularly, that if these programs are going to work which we on the Federal level send down to the local level, they are going to work only if we can get local communities and people in those communities to be concerned and involved. One of the ways, of course, to get them concerned and involved, as we found out and as the GAO report said, was to make sure they are contributing in kind, and some money and also contributing volunteer work, which I can see will go down the pipe.

Let us take New York City and see how they would suffer from this. Last year they did not worry about the 40-percent match. They actually matched up to about 87 percent.

With all the problems they are having at the present time, looking at New York City if, in fact, they look at that 87-percent matching contribution that they put up, if they decide here is one area we can get a handle on the problem we have and we will start reducing in kind and the many other contributions that we are making and get down closer to the 20 percent, perhaps they only go to the 40 percent through our encouragement and the programs they have must suffer tremendously.

I think the one point we have to remember, if there are no more Federal dollars, and I have had no guarantee and I do not think my chairman has any guarantee that there is going to be anything that could possibly pick up the loss they would have if they cut the local level to 20 percent, if we get down to that point, then the local agencies have to suffer a 20-percent cut in their total spending, the total money that is available, because they will not get additional money.

Think carefully about this, because on the surface it looks like it is great. The Federal Government is going to pick up 80 percent. Then we will not have to go out and raise money. That is the major objection, not that they cannot get it. Their major objection is that they do not like to do that kind of thing; but if they do not get any more Federal dollars, then we have to remember that is a way to start this program on the slide and when we are talking about reducing expenditures over the next couple years and trying to get to a balanced budget, as the President says, I think if you want to kill the program, go to 80–20, because I believe in 3 years time it will pretty well come to a natural death, because there will not be more Federal funds and there will be less local effort.

Think carefully about this. Look at the testimony and look at the comments of my chairman as we were out in the field listening to their arguments and I think you will realize that we either go 60–40, as we are presently doing, nobody suffering, the waiver used 260 some times the last time and that waiver is available to the Director now; we either are going to help them sustain themselves going 60–40 or cut the legs out from under the program, because the total effort would be reduced by at least 20 percent.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOODLING. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, to give the House the perspective and the magnitude of the size of the waiver, is it not true that they matched 25 percent of the program?

Mr. GOODLING. Yes; there were about 800-some programs. There were 200-some waivers.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. The Secretary has taken a fairly positive attitude.

Mr. GOODLING. With very little justification, as I can tell in the release; I do not think he used very much. He used it very liberally. He has that waiver and used it and nobody objected.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment. The House has debated this issue virtually every time we have considered legislation to extend the Economic Opportunity Act.

As enacted in 1964, the Economic Opportunity Act provided for a 90-percent Federal share of financial assistance to community action programs. The Federal share was changed to 80 percent in 1967, when Federal antipoverty programs had achieved significant local acceptance. In 1974, the formula was altered by requiring a reduction in the Federal contribution beginning in fiscal year 1975 with a Federal share of 80 percent, declining to 70 percent in fiscal year 1976, and finally to 60 percent in 1977. A slightly higher Federal contribution is allowed to those agencies receiving financial assistance below $300,000.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have to recognize that we made a very serious mistake in 1974. This administration and Community Action people across the country have provided strong and persuasive testimony along these lines.

The testimony has been overwhelming. Many CAPS have told us that they will have to curtail their programs because they simply cannot raise the higher local contribution mandated in 1974.

It is particularly those Community Action programs in rural areas where there is the greatest hardship. It is not that there is an unwillingness to support Community Action. The fact is the money just is not there in rural areas where there is minimal tax resources and little private business.

Local governments are hard put for funds, and inflation is taking every day a deeper bite into budgets. The present matching formula of 60–40 is totally unrealistic in light of present economic conditions. Consider that in 1975 that in order to receive $300,000 in Federal money the local community had to provide $75,000. This year, to remain eligible for the same amount of Federal money, the community would have to raise $200,000, over 2½ times what was required only 2½ years ago.

The gentleman's amendment in effect punishes those areas of the country which are in greatest need.

Local government is saying, "Yes, we would like to help, but there are demands for increased school budgets and the other necesary services."

The Community Action programs simply do not fare well in the competition.

It is true that some programs have not had to be curtailed because they have secured a waiver of the matching requirement. In 1976, 266 waivers were granted—nearly one-third of the Community Action programs. When so many exceptions to the law are needed, something is wrong. We are forcing local Community Action agency people to devote overwhelming time and energy to the burden of administrative paperwork. The gentleman's amendment will greatly increase redtape and paperwork over what will be the case if the committee bill prevails.

I think this House wants to reduce redtape and paperwork wherever it can, and here is a good opportunity.

Not only are Community Action people being taken away from the job of providing services to low-income people, they are also being turned into fund raisers. As one CAP Director told us, "My job description has been rewritten. Rather than planning, evaluating, and implementing programs and being out in the community working with poor people, I've become a fund raiser."

The trend in the past several years in Congress has generally produced lower non-Federal share requirements in Federal grant programs. The Comprehensive Employment and Training Act (CETA), for example, requires no non-Federal contribution. Most adult education programs receive 90 percent Federal funding, and programs such as Headstart and Follow Through, originally conceived by OEO has the 80–20 funding ratio, as do most of the HUD programs.

Everyone would agree that local support for a program is essential, especially in the case of a community action program based primarily on grassroots involvement. What is difficult to understand is why this program—which serves the most disadvantaged areas with the lowest tax bases—has been singled out to provide a greater local contribution than most Federal programs.

No one is arguing for the elimination of the local contribution requirement for Community Action programs. A return to 80–20 would allow local agency administrators to devote primary attention to program development and operation. It would be a realistic requirement which would be strictly enforced.

I urge your support of the committee and Carter administration position on this important provision.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman not admit that if we get non-Federal dollars and we go to 80–20, the Federal dollars remain the same, and we would reduce local efforts by 20 percent? And then do we not reduce the total amount available to carry on the programs?

Mr. PERKINS. If the Federal dollars remain the same that might be true. I hope the local contribution would continue at the current rate and that we can increase appropriations at the Federal level.

Mr. GOODLING. And is there any guarantee that the Federal dollars will mean any more than an inflation increase?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the Committee on Appropriations will do. I hope they will provide increases. I do know that to require local communities which do not have the money to come up with 40 percent of the cost will bring about a situation where many communities will not have any program at all. We have about 850 community action agencies in the country.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, in 1976 we had 256 waivers, and in 1977 we only had 160. But the point remains that no one suffered because a waiver was available, and, for instance, they used it in the gentleman's district.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, if we have that many waivers, I think that proves beyond any reasonable doubt that we need a lesser requirement on local communities. There are communities that did not ask for a waiver who really needed one. Many communities were seriously affected because of the 60–40 requirement. They could not conduct programs they needed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BRADEMAS, and by unanimous consent, Mr. PERKINS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will yield first to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING), and then I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. BRADEMAS).

Mr. GOODLING. Again, Mr. Chairman, may I ask, is it not true that if we get more Federal dollars, because of the inflation that has set in, they will suffer a total loss of money if we reduce our attempt to get greater local effort and use the waivers?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, let me say this: In many instances they may not ask for a waiver. It requires a lot of extra redtape and a lot of extra paperwork on the part of the communities that need funding the most.

Many communities just are not going to go through that.

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BRADEMAS. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I want to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS), the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, in opposing the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the 60–40 split, as the committee has pointed out, would reduce the funds available for the people this program is designed to assist. Under the 60–40 split, local community service program directors would be forced to allocate far too much time to seeking matching funds instead of being able to devote their energies to the fundamental task of combating poverty.

We all know that local communities are already under great pressure to cut back on their spending, and these programs are the ones which will suffer the most.

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill also wisely permits total "in-kind" non-Federal contributions, rather than partial cash contributions. The local agencies receive a far better value for these "in-kind" contributions under an 80–20 matching grant program than under the 60–40 split.

Reducing the Federal share serves little purpose if it only compels States to abandon the programs because they find them too costly to maintain.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, our research and our hearings indicated that there was not one waiver that was denied.

Does the gentleman have any record to indicate that these waivers were denied?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) has expired.

(On request of Mr. GOODLING and by unanimous consent, Mr. PERKINS was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, let me say that it has been my experience, traveling through the Appalachian area—and talking with the Members in the House who represent larger cities of the country and who represent ghetto sections, that there are many complaints about the 60–40 matching ratios. They say it is just too much. I do not think we should place the extra requirement on them. They should be treated like other governmental programs.

I think the gentleman's amendment should be voted down.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Of the seven agencies, in half of those instances you were able to come up with more than the 40 percent. In the others, you have waivers. Now again, do we not reduce the total amount of money that they will have if we do not increase the Federal amount considerably—not just a little—and, on the other hand, reduce the amount of local effort? Do we not reduce the amount of the total money that they have?

Mr. PERKINS. Let me answer the gentleman's question by stating that to reduce the local requirement down to 20 percent, naturally, means that the Federal Government has to put up 80 percent. The 20-percent requirement could be—in many instances, it is—meet with in kind contributions, in facilities, services, and items of that nature. I want to repeat to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the poorer communities will derive much greater benefit from the 80–20 matching than they would from the 60–40 matching. There will be no growth at either the Federal or local levels if we have a 60–40 ratio.

Mr. GOODLING. If the gentleman will yield further, I have no problem with that argument if you can guarantee everyone that the Federal Government is going to put up that extra 20 percent. The gentleman and I know the mood of this Congress at the present time and the mood of this country is such that we do not stand a snowball's chance in Hades to ever come up with any additional money.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not think the Members of this Congress want to see the poorer communities of this country deprived of this program which is designed for them.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania should be voted down.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) has expired.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) may be allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. BROWN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words and I rise in opposition to the gentleman's amendment. Section 225 of the Economic Opportunity Act, which establishes the Federal/State ratio for community action programs, was initially set at 90–10. In 1967, the law was amended to provide an 80–20 ratio, and in 1974 a descending ratio was established, pegging the ratio at 60–40 for CAP's serving over 300,000, and a slightly higher proportion for smaller CAP's.

In 1975, the Community Services Administration issued only two waivers to Community Action Agencies which were unable to come up with the requisite local funding. In 1976, 266 waivers were granted, or roughly one-third of the grantees, my district among them. Meanwhile Head Start and Follow Through, which are authorized under this same bill, retain an 80–20 ratio.

The administration, the National Advisory Council on Economic Opportunity, and countless public witnesses who testified before our subcommittee, support the return to the 80–20, which insures adequate local commitment without the paperwork and diversion of attention from program development and operation to fundraising. The truth is that local communities have been unable to provide the increased funding commitment in light of mounting costs for services. I urge my colleagues to endorse the Committee's recommendation to return to the 80–20 ratio, thus assuring sufficient Federal support coupled with a realistic figure for local commitment. The result is a program which can operate without having to spend an inordinate amount of time and manpower trying to pry funds loose from city hall or the public.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the gentleman's remarks.

Frankly I think we all know what this is all about. It is about killing the program. If we do not want to see this program exist in various areas of the country, then we should pass this amendment. If we support programs to aid the elderly and to have proper nutrition and to have Head Start programs and to have youth centers and to have other centers and provide for hiring of people from the communities who are paraprofessionals who know their communities best, then we want to defeat the amendment.

Frankly a great deal has been mentioned about in-kind contributions being in the small places. In my cities and suburbs where they have this program I know many people who provide in-kind contributions. They are the elderly who have an awful lot to give and they do not want to sit at home and they are mobile individuals, and in their wisdom they have decided to volunteer, and this is the sort of in-kind contribution that in many places occurs. Lots of women who are homemakers who do not necessarily want to go out and have gainful employment, want to volunteer and feel creative in assisting these programs. They are the very people who provide in-kind contributions.

Frankly some years ago I as a member of a resident board who participated in the community came here to Washington to object to President Nixon's trying to kill the Office of Economic Opportunity. Somehow, through some miracle, that did not take place. So let us hope for another miracle and defeat the amendment.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the same question of the gentleman. If we do not get a considerable increase from the Federal Government and we reduce the local contribution, do they not have then less money to spend on the program?

Mr. CORRADA. Not really, because the 20 percent matching requirement is not a restriction or a limit. A few weeks ago the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) said in the State of New York they were matching 80 percent.

Mr. GOODLING. But if there were no additional Federal dollars, and let us say the gentleman got $6,000 this year from Federal money and $6,000 next year, and we have no guarantee they will get more, and they had some waivers, when they had some problems, we will find out and the gentlewoman will find out next year that it was her effort to have 80–20 that is going to kill this program over the next few years as we get anxious about balancing the budget. It is not going to be the 60–40 that will kill it. It is going to be the 80–20.

Mr. ERLENBORN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING).

Mr. Chairman, I will not take the full 5 minutes but just let me make a few observations.

The chairman of our committee, the gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. PERKINS) said we must take the word of the directors of the Community Action Agencies. I do not think we must and I do not think we really ought to. Our Committee on Government Operations looked into what these directors of the Community Action Agencies have been doing and the chairman of that subcommittee, the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. FOUNTAIN) has well documented what they have been doing.

To a great extent what they have been doing is forming associations, professional associations of Directors of Community Action Agencies. Then they have held their conventions in some of the finest watering spots in this country and elsewhere and they take the appropriated money and they use it to travel and entertain each other.

You know, Mr. Chairman, that really is hardly the kind of person that I think we have to look to for advice as to what to do with this legislation.

If there was one word of evidence, of real evidence in the hearing record that there is hardship then it might be justified to move in the direction that the committee bill provides. The hearing record shows no hardship.

We have a provision now that generally 40 percent of the funds must come from local levels. If there is hardship, the current law says a waiver may be granted up to 100 percent. There is no limit. There is nothing to control the discretion of the administration, the director of the community services administration could provide 100-percent Federal funding if there is a real hardship.

So, in the absence of a hardship, with the very valid arguments of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this could lead many of the agencies to have less funding because it would not increase the Federal funds but would decrease the local funding. it seems to me absolute folly to move in the direction that the committee bill would move.

We have no promise that we are going to have more funding for this program. As a matter of fact. I read in the press today that the President has suggested that next year we should have a $5 billion reduction in the already proposed budget. That would be $5 billion across the board. I assume that means a percentage reduction in this program as well as all of the rest.

There is no justification for the committee provision and I would hope that the amendment would be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 158, noes 224, not voting 50, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HUCKABY

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUCKABY: Page 20, after line 13, insert the following:

SEC. 3. (a) Section 210(c) of the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 (42 U.S.C. 2790(c)) is amended by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following new sentences: "The Director, in determining whether a county or multicounty unit is eligible to be served by a community action agency under this title, shall not apply, as the sole criterion for eligibility, any requirement or restriction relating to the number of individuals residing in the county or multicounty unit (or otherwise take into account the population of the county or multicounty unit) if at least 20 percent of the families and unrelated individuals residing therein have incomes below the poverty line, as determined by the Director (utilizing the criteria of poverty used by the Bureau of the Census in compiling the 1970 decennial census). No new community action agency may be designated under subsection (a) within a county or multicounty unit if—

"(1) such county or multicounty unit has a population of less than 50,000;

"(2) such county or multicounty unit was served by an existing community action agency on June 1, 1978, and continues to be served by such agency; and

"(3) the new community action agency would serve an area smaller than that served by an existing community action agency on June 1, 1978.".

Page 20, line 14, strike out "Sec. 3. (a)" and insert in lieu thereof "(b)".

Page 20, line 18, strike out "(b)" and insert in lieu thereof "(c)".

Page 20, line 21, strike out "(c)" and insert in lieu thereof "(d)".

Mr. HUCKABY (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Louisiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUCKABY. Mr. Chairman, the overall purpose of my amendment is to prevent rural communities, who otherwise are eligible to be served by a Community Action Agency, from being rejected solely because of an artificial population criterion imposed by the Community Services Administration. My amendment would simply direct the Community Services Administration to disregard population as a sole criterion in designating Community Action Agencies in a county or multicounty unit if at least 20 percent of the families residing in these areas are poverty stricken. Providing community services to the poor should primarily be based upon their needs and impoverished areas should not be denied access to a Community Action Agency simply because they do not meet an arbitrary population test.

Let me emphasize several aspects of my amendment. First, it does not prevent the Community Services Administration from utilizing criteria other than population in refusing to recognize or fund a Community Action Agency in impoverished areas. Current law establishes a number of other criteria that must be assessed before a Community Action Agency is either recognized or funded. For example, current law clearly requires that a Community Action Agency have the capabilities of planning, conducting, administering and evaluating a community action program. Without such a capacity, a Community Action Agency cannot be recognized.

Section 221(e) of the act requires the Director of the Community Services Administration to "consider the probable capacity of the agency to carry out an effective program before providing financial assistance." Section 221(d) requires that, as an additional condition of financial assistance, each Community Action Agency must have adopted a systematic approach to provide for basic education, health care, vocational training, and employment opportunities to enable the poor living in rural areas to remain in such areas and become self-sufficient therein. Section 244(7) prohibits the Director of the Community Services Administration from extending financial assistance in any case where the costs of developing and administering programs exceed 15 percent of the total costs, including non-Federal contributions to such costs, of such progams. In this regard, I would like to point out that on the average, Community Action Agencies nationwide have had low administrative costs of approximately 8 percent of the total costs. These good administrative practices will set an example for future Community Action Agencies to follow.

Second, my amendment will not result in a proliferation of demands upon the Community Services Administration to recognize new Community Action Agencies. My amendment only addresses the "minimum test" for a community to be served by a Community Action Agency. Currently, a Community Action Agency cannot be recognized in a country or multicounty unit if there are less than 50,000 in the area. This artificial barrier does not give impoverished rural communities even a chance to prove that a cost-effective community action program can be administered. In light of the other criteria that must be reviewed prior to recognizing or funding a Community Action Agency, this arbitrary population limitation is unfair and unjustified. My amendment corrects this inequity by waiving the population requirement as the sole criterion in recognizing a Community Action Agency if at least 20 percent of the families residing within such a county or multicounty unit have incomes below the poverty line as defined by the Bureau of the Census.

Mr. Chairman, there are those who would argue that a community with less than 50,000 persons of which at least 20 percent are poor lacks local resources and skills which would be utilized for purposes of a community action program. This argument does not hold true for all such communities. I know of at least two instances in my State where the Governor recognized a Community Action Agency in a rural area only to have the Community Services Administration reject the designation because of the artificial population limitation.

Third, my amendment will not split or cause to split existing county or multicounty Community Action Agencies. My amendment has been drafted so as to lock in those counties currently serviced by an existing Community Action Agency. No new Community Action Agency can be designated in an area of less than 50,000 unless the new Community Action Agency is merely replacing a previously existing one or the area was not previously serviced by a Community Action Agency. I want to also make it quite clear that by offering my amendment, I do not intend for any funds going toward existing Community Action Agencies to be shifted over to finance new ones designated as a result of the adoption of my amendment.

I am concerned, as I am sure are many of my colleagues, of the costs to the Federal Government that may be generated by the designation of new Community Action Agencies if my proposal is adopted. Therefore, I would suggest that a feasibility study be conducted to determine the degree of necessity for additional federal funds and non-Federal shares.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I believe my amendment is sound and sensitive. It is sound because it provides opportunity not waste or proliferation. It is sensitive because it focuses on the key problem which Community Action Agencies are created to alleviate—poverty. My amendment is well within the policy of the Community Services Act, and the Community Services Administration has indicated to me that it has no objections to my proposal. In view of this and the other facts I have brought to your attention, I urge your favorable consideration and support for the passage of my amendment.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, for the record, I do need to ask the gentleman four questions. I will try to be brief.

Am I correct in my reading of the proposed amendment that in an area where a CAA now exists, any proposed new CAA would be required to meet all three of the criteria contained in the amendment?

Mr. HUCKABY. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, my answer is, "Yes," you are correct in your interpretation. The intent of my amendment is to emphasize that all the requirements be met, not just one.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. It appears that only county governments or multi-county units but not cities or other municipalities would be affected by this amendment. Am I correct?

Mr. HUCKABY. Yes, you are correct. This amendment is directed primarily at rural counties and multicounty units that have a significant level of their population living in poverty and are not presently being served by Community Action Agencies.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. According to your proposed amendment, CSA cannot impose an arbitrary population minimum to determine eligibility for an area in which no CAA has ever operated. Would potential for generating the required amount of non-Federal share, present ability to receive other funding demonstrated by kind and number of other Federal grants, potential for mobilizing private and State funds, assurances that the unit of government has not rejected a reasonable opportunity to combine with other areas, etc., be the kind of review criteria that would be logical for CSA to use?

Mr. HUCKABY. You are correct in stating that CSA cannot impose an arbitrary population minimum to determine elgibility for an area in which no CAA has ever operated. I encourage existing CAA's where feasible to serve adjacent noncapped counties. Where it is not feasible, then CSA will develop review criteria and regulations that will address questions such as the potential for generating non-Federal share, the ability to mobilize private and State funds, et cetera, in designating new Community Action Agencies.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, this is my last question:

This proposed amendment would not, I assume, require all existing CAA's to go through another designation and recognition process.

Mr. HUCKABY. Correct. My amendment makes it clear that present designations remain in effect and the amendment would not automatically trigger a new time-consuming process.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, the committee has no objection to the gentleman's amendment. We will support it.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, of course, being the representative of an area which is relatively rural, I cannot object to the amendment; but I must make some history here because I do not want anyone coming back and saying we helped to kill the program.

What the gentleman is doing is taking that sam· existing small amount of money we have and spreading it over more agencies. Therefore, it means that the existing agency has to get less money next year or the new agencies do not get any, as I would read the amendment, because I do not see any more Federal dollars.

However, Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 7577, which amends the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 in order to improve the administration of the Community Service Administration and the Head Start program. The bill aso extends authorizations for the programs administered by CSA, for the Head Start and follow through programs and for native American programs.

I am especially pleased to note that the bill extends authorization for the followthrough program for another 5 years, while increasing its appropriations incrementally and expanding eligibility. It also provides an additional 3-year authorization for the national youth sports program.

The programs to be authorized here today underscore this Nation's commitment to help the poor of this Nation to free themselves from the degradation of mind and spirit which is too often the lot of the impoverished.

Before us are programs which affect the lives of 25 million people considered by the statisticians to be poor. In many cases, they touch the lives of another 15 million who are one accident or one lost job away from statistical poverty. The poor we are talking about include 6.5 million children, 2 million older people and 7 million handicapped and developmentally disabled people. Through local community action agencies, CSA programs under such titles as Community Food and Nutrition, Senior Opportunities and Services, Rural Housing Development and Rehabilitation attack the causes and symptoms of poverty at the grassroots level. This bill, through administrative improvements and, in some cases, formula changes, insures that the Federal contribution to these programs is more efficiently and effectively utilized.

As I mentioned earlier, the Education and Labor Committee's action with respect to the follow through program is worthy of particular note. Follow through, which is the conceptual first cousin of the Head Start program, provides instructional, nutritional, medical, dental and psycho-social services to eligible children. It is administered by the Office of Education. Although originally designed for kindergarten and first grade level, the program has expanded through the third grade level. In the current school year, 1977–1978, there are 74,676 students enrolled in the program. It is projected that for the school year 1978–1979, the program will consist of 21 projects and 20 sponsors, providing for 3,477 classrooms in 527 schools. It is estimated that the program will utilize 3,514 classroom assistants and 4,297 para-professionals, most of whom are parents of enrolled children.

Follow through has been under a misguided attack by the administration, which recommended its phase out and offered in its place a vague plan to fold many of its services into a program funded under title I. Much of the criticism of the follow through program subscribed to by the administration was based on an evaluation of the program by a private research association. This research, unfortunately, was very incomplete. In fact, only 12 of 20 different instructional approaches taken in follow through were examined.

While it is true that the program has had difficulty in establishing a clear programmatic direction, this was due in large part to separate and insulated programmatic authority within the Office of Education between the division of follow through and the Office of Budgeting and Evaluation. The solution, as the report language to this bill indicates, is to encourage the Office of Education to devote a serious effort to clearly delineate the responsibilities of two subdepartments and not to scuttle follow through.

The committee is to be commended for looking to improve the program, rather than dropping it because there is so much to recommend this reauthorization of follow through. As your constituent mail may indicate, the program has been enthusiastically supported by the parents and children affected by the program. The Committee on Education and Labor reports that it is particularly impressed with the active involvement of parents and teachers in the planning and implementation of the local projects. Parental integration into all aspects of delivery of these comprehensive services for the children has produced a significant impact on the parents themselves. For example, the program has generated for many parents the desire to improve their own education and has increased their involvement in the lives of their children. This fact alone speaks of the enormous contribution of follow through to the education and human development of the Nation's poor.

I can personally substantiate the committee observation. For the last 9 years, Follow Through has been operating successfully in the Pittsfield, Mass., schools. I have visited the classrooms of the 195 children enrolled, and I came away highly impressed. I am pleased to say that parents are involved as assistant teachers and as health and educational aides. In fact, two parents of children in Follow Through will be receiving their bachelor's degrees this year as a result of encouragement from the program.

Another positive feature out of H.R. 7577 is that it amends the current law to provide eligibility for children enrolled in private nonprofit elementary schools who were previously enrolled in preschool programs of a compensatory nature, which received Federal financing assistance. This will give the program a wider, more diverse impact.

Finally, the national youth sports program is worthy of special praise. It encourages colleges, universities, and certain nonprofit organizations to provide physical fitness instruction to rural and urban disadvantaged youth. For example, like other programs around the country, the program at my alma mater, Boston College, offers its high quality facilities as well as supervision and related education and counselling services—including instruction, concerning study practices, career opportunities, job responsibilities, health and nutrition and drug programs—to disadvantaged Boston youth.

The youth sports program, which is conducted by local institutions primarily during the summertime with special reinforcement followup programs throughout the year, is coordinated on a national basis and is funded through an 80/20 percent formula. I have worked for full appropriations of this program in the past and will do so this year.

In sum, there is much to recommend the programs found under the provisions of this bill. They help provide economic opportunity and community services for those who need them most. I recommend passage of these amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. HUCKABY).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any other amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CORRADA

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CORRADA: Page 32, line 21, insert immediately after the word "agencies", the following: "and state offices of economic opportunity".

Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Chairman, section 632(3) requires the Director of CSA to consult with community action agencies in the development of the 5-year national poverty action plan. Current law does not require any consultation. My amendment would provide for consultation with State economic opportunity offices in this important planning function. In this manner we get a broader input from those who have a direct interest in national policy issues pertaining to poverty.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to the gentleman's amendment on this side.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORRADA. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, there are no objections to the gentleman's amendment on this side.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Puerto Rico (Mr. CORRADA).

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to bring to your attention today the national demonstration water project which the Community Services Administration has funded since 1972, to demonstrate methods of delivering rural water and wastewater facilities to low-income rural residents at a cost they can afford. The national demonstration water project grew out of a successful experiment by the Total Action Against Poverty in the Roanoke Valley, located in my congressional district. It now contains a network of organizations in 38 States which have an impressive record. Almost 40,000 water and sewer connections are being developed nationally, 11,000 of which are in Virginia.

I have taken the time to review this matter in some detail because it exemplifies a cost-effective, relatively inexpensive program which provides clearly visible benefits for the rural poor. While its value is generally acknowledged, it could go under because of the inadequacy of Federal officials in Washington, D.C., who have ultimate responsibility for its future.

After 5 years as a pilot project within the Community Services Administration, national demonstration water project officials believe the time has arrived to transfer the program to a permanent home within a Federal agency directly concerned with water and sewer needs. However, it is my understanding that no other Federal agency has made such a firm commitment. Funds for this program expire on September 30, 1978. I believe that the Community Services Administration is responsible for seeing that the mechanisms of successful demonstration programs are in place before they are spun off to other agencies. I would like to know if the Community Services Administration is willing to provide carryover funds until negotiations for transition are effected.

I would also like some assurance that the Community Services Administration will use the expertise of the national demonstration water project in any subsequent effort in the rural water and sewer field.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, like the gentleman I have an intense interest in improving methods of delivering rural water and wastwater facilities to low-income rural residents at a cost they can afford. It is not in my power, however, to give the assurances the gentleman requests. I will work with the gentleman, however, to assure that the matter is given every appropriate consideration by the Community Services Administration and failing that with other Federal agencies.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Kentucky for his assurances.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, since the Subcommittee on Economic Opportunity of the Committee on Education and Labor began its work last year on the Economic Opportunity and Community Services Amendments of 1978, H.R. 7577, several issues have arisen which I feel compelled to address.

Initially, I want to compliment our chairman, the Honorable CARL D. PERKINS, and the ranking minority member, ALBERT H. QUIE, for devoting their time and attention to the dilemmas faced by the committee in the consideration of this legislation.

In the Head Start program, the subcommittee discovered with the assistance of the Congressional Research Service (CRS) of the Library of Congress that in fiscal year 1976 and fiscal year 1977 that the Administration for Children, Youth and Families (ACYF) in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare did not follow the legislatively mandated formula written by Congress in 1975. I found this especially disturbing because the formula was specifically designed to spread out Head Start funds more equitably than they had been prior to 1975 when there had been no formula whatsoever. What the subcommittee found when it analyzed the CRS report on distribution of funds was that 12 States and Puerto Rico received less than the minimum amounts that were required by law. The States and the amounts of the discrepancies were:

|---|---|
| Arizona | $542,895 |
| Connecticut | 677,594 |
| Georgia | 1,156,214 |
| Illinois | 2,627,910 |
| Maryland | 621,045 |
| Michigan | 5,655,001 |
| New York | 315,289 |
| Ohio | 1,648,872 |
| Oregon | 560,481 |
| Pennsylvania | 3,898,751 |
| South Dakota | 75,180 |
| Wisconsin | 137,136 |
| Puerto Rico | 1,648,944 |

What ACYF did was apply the hold-harmless level established by Congress in 1975, and then apply the two-part formula, based on the number of children qualifying for public assistance and the number of children coming from families below the poverty level. Minimal increases in appropriations and the application by ACYF in fiscal year 1976 and 1977 of a 6-percent cost-of-living increase to all States, including those which were under the hold harmless provisions, added to the inequities Congress sought to minimize by adopting a formula approach in 1975.

When Congress approved a $150 million increase in appropriations for fiscal year 1978, the formula application issue became more crucial. After months of deliberations, the subcommittee was compelled to direct Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare Joseph Califano to allocate the 1978 funds in a particular manner which insured that States which lost during the years of the ACYF misapplication of the formula could make up some of their losses. From the beginning, it was clear, however, that this directive was only temporary and statutory changes were needed. Because the subcommittee directive resulted in substantial increases for 22 States, ACYF was also instructed to permit States to carry over fiscal year 1978 funds into fiscal year 1979. This procedure gives States an adjustment period to determine where new programs can be established and how best to allocate the increased funds.

The subcommittee's deliberations have aroused considerable concern on the part of Head Start programs in States which have been receiving more money than they would have had ACYF strictly followed the statutory formula. Their fear of receiving a cut in funding was a major point of discussion while the subcommittee was developing a new formula. In fact, the subcommittee formula being proposed includes an automatic 6-percent cost-of-living adjustment for all Head Start programs, except those in States which receive more than 200 percent of the amount to which they are entitled under the formula. It should be pointed out that this cost-of-living adjustment would amount to more than $30 million under the current appropriation, and would not be based in any way on programmatic needs. It serves as an annual adjustment for States who would otherwise receive no new money under an equalizing formula.

The subcommittee formula calls for distributing funds based equally on the number of AFDC recipients in each State and on the number of children aged 0 to 5 living with low-income families. There was some discussion by the subcommittee on eliminating the count of children from families receiving AFDC. I believe the subcommittee has made a wise choice in keeping the two-factor formula on counting eligible children. To disqualify AFDC children for counting purposes would be an unjust and irresponsible move. Although States choose to fund their public assistance programs at different levels, their recipients are no less needy nor their children no less wanting for the kinds of services the Head Start program provides.

I am especially supportive of the bill's provisions continuing a high degree of parent and local resident participation in the program. Since its inception in 1964, I have seen a tremendous amount of progress attributable to the Head Start program in many of the young children in my congressional district. The involvement of parents has played an important role in insuring this success, and local school people have also found that it leads to greater parental participation in later school years.

I was pleased to be a participant in the formulation of the original Economic Opportunity Act in 1964, and I am proud to be a supporter again in its reauthorization. The active and beneficial participation of Communities United For Action, the Community Action Agency in my district, has been a significant addition to the communities it serves. The continuation of this program is justified and necessary.●

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

If not, under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OBERSTAR, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 7577) to amend the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 1234, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 346, nays 38, not voting 48, as follows:

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ANDREWS of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed, H.R. 7577.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS, TO SIT DURING THE 5-MINUTE RULE, THURSDAY, JULY 27, 1978

Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs may have permission to sit during the 5-minute rule, Thursday, July 27, to hear testimony from the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board. There will be no markup of any legislation during this meeting of the Banking Committee.

This request has been cleared with the ranking minority member of the House Banking Committee, the Honorable J. WILLIAM STANTON of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the gentleman can assure us that there will be absolutely no legislative action taken during this time?

Mr. TUCKER. I can offer assurance there will be no legislative activity of any kind. This request has been cleared with the ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. STANTON).

Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN PEOPLE FED UP WITH POSTAL SERVICE

(Mr. LATTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, the American people are very unhappy with what they have been getting from the Postal Service.

To use the words of one of my good constituents, Gerald Avery, of Bowling Green, Ohio, they are "fed up" with what has been going on and they want something done about it. Rates are up, service is down, wages are up, and illegal strikes are taking place.

Mr. Speaker, this all started with the making of the Postal Service an independent agency. As soon as the control of the Postal Service was taken from the Congress and given to this independent agency, trouble began. Immediately the new agency forgot that its first and foremost responsibility is to the public and started giving the unions practically everything they wanted, including the key to the Treasury. Giving this agency the power to fix rates for mail service was undoubtedly the worst mistake of all. We now have an independent postal agency contracting with its unions for wages higher than those prevailing in the area for comparable work and then fixing the rates to be charged the public to pay for the same without the slightest oversight or approval by the Congress. The only time this independent agency comes to the Congress is when its excesses cause it to run short of money.

Mr. Speaker, someplace along the line the public has been forgotten and it is high time this shortcoming is corrected. Frankly, the time has come for the Congress to resume control over this agency and to give it some supervision as it is clearly out of hand.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, earlier this evening when the vote was taken on the bill H.R. 3350, I was unavoidably detained.

If I had been present, I would have voted "aye."

IN HONOR OF PETE ROSE—CINCINNATI REDS

(Mr. LUKEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, once again the activities of the Cincinnati Red's third baseman, Pete Rose, have attracted nationwide attention.

Earlier this year, on May 8, I called the attention of the House to the 3,000th career hit of Pete Rose. I remarked at that time that Pete Rose may well be the favorite athlete of the Nation. Some newspapers accused me of hyperbole, of being excessive in my estimate of Pete's reputation.

These past few weeks the astonished eyes of baseball fans across the Nation have been turned to Pete Rose as he chased the hitting streak record.

Last night before a tumultously cheering crowd at Shea Stadium in New York, the irrepressible Pete Rose did it again. He ran his hitting streak to 38 straight games, shattering the 33-year-old modern National League record. This is the second largest streak in 56 years.

Tommy Holmes, the previous record holder was on hand last night, to offer his congratulations to Pete. Mr. Holmes said that the new title is "in the hands of a Hall of Famer."

Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question that Pete Rose has reached the heights. His outstanding spirit and drive are an inspiration to us all.

I ask my colleagues to join me and the citizens of Cincinnati in congratulating Pete Rose and offering him the best of luck in the days ahead, as he continues to set new records.●

STATEMENT ON CONRAIL

(Mr. SKUBITZ asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Speaker, within the next few weeks this body will be considering a $1.3 billion authorization for USRA to provide money for ConRail. In anticipation of that deliberation I want to make a few remarks about ConRail and the distinguished chairman of the Transportation and Commerce Subcommittee, the Honorable FRED B. ROONEY.

Six or seven years ago it become clear to all of us that rail transportation in the entire Northeast was completely falling apart. The Penn Central had gone bankrupt in 1970, and its bankruptcy had a domino effect for six other carriers in the Northeast. By the end of 1975, Northeast rail service had deteriorated to such a point that the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee had to seriously examine not only Northeast railroads but also the rail industry in its entirety. You will recall that in December of 1975 our committee brought to the floor an omnibus piece of rail legislation which finally became law in February of 1976.

I was then, and am now, the ranking Republician on the Transportation and Commerce Subcommittee which designed and perfected that piece of legislation. The chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. ROONEY, then as now demonstrated his leadership qualities, his patience, and understanding in attacking the rail problem in the Northeast and basic problems which tend to weaken the railroad industry as a whole. His task was not an easy one because everyone and his brother had a pie-in-the-sky scheme for making the trains run right in the Northeast.

The final choices we considered narrowed down to two. One was the creation of ConRail, which the committee and the Congress adopted. The other choice would have been wholesale abandonments in the Northeast of rail service and a fire sale for those lines that the richer Western railroads wanted to take over. I must confess that I leaned toward the fire sale approach more than once. In my State of Kansas, as in most States in the United States, many people viewed the railroad fiasco of the Northeast as a problem for the States and people of the Northeast to deal with. The logic and persuasiveness of our chairman convinced me that the Northeast problem was a national problem. I might add that his untiring efforts, his understanding of the problem and his sincerity probably changed more minds than any other single factor in this matter.

Today all of us recognize that ConRail is not and cannot be a magic solution to the rail problems in the Northeast. All of us realize that the same kind of time, patience, and understanding as exhibited by Mr. ROONEY would be necessary from all of us if the ConRail management were to be able to turn around the rail disaster in the Northeast. From time to time we see articles in the newspaper which report that ConRail has stumbled on this or that particular policy. All of us should realize that those "stumbles" are likely to occur for the next few years. It takes time to turn a disaster around. It takes time to undo the multiple wrongs of the past. It takes time to develop and run a good railroad.

Chairman ROONEY has not been sitting idly by while time gives ConRail a chance to work.

At the time we considered the ConRail legislation in 1975 it became clear that the Northeast rail situation was but a tip of the iceberg affecting our national rail industry. Over the years Government regulation and indifference to rail problems had taken its toll.

I might add that Government promotion of barges and trucks had also taken its toll. Just as we cannot expect miracles from ConRail, neither can we expect miracles from the Government in developing a more effective framework for railroad operation. It takes hard work, careful analysis, and considerable education for any of us to know the best solution to a most perplexing problem. FRED ROONEY has conducted numerous hearings, congressional symposiums, and summit meetings with railroad management, railroad labor, and shippers throughout the country. He has done this in order to identify all of the problems affecting railroads in order to develop carefully tailored solutions for this Nation's weakened railroad system.

I want to commend my colleague, chairman, and friend for his skillful leadership and dedication. I also want to take this opportunity to alert my colleagues to the fact that the business of saving the railroads in the Northeast and the Nation is far from over and that we can achieve our goal only by taking a step at a time. Within the next few weeks ConRail will be on the floor and over the weeks and months to come we will move forward in order to give this Nation a truly great railroad system.

I will be leaving Congress after this year so many of the railroad bills which are necessary to do the job will be on the floor after I have left. I know that Members on both sides of the aisle will give my friend, Mr. ROONEY, their full attention and cooperation in carrying out the job ahead. Over the years I have found him to be a fair and honorable man who does his homework and knows what he is talking about.

NATIONAL CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California (Mr. ROUSSELOT) is recognized for 30 minutes.

● Mr. ROUSSELOT. Mr. Speaker, since this House will have to consider a conference report on the Senate-passed version of H.R. 2777, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act, I believe it will be helpful to my colleagues to review the following report by the Congressional Budget Office on the cost of the Senate bill, as it appears in Senate Report 95-795:

COST OF LEGISLATION

Pursuant to section 252(a) of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970, as amended, the committee estimates the cost of the legislation to be as stated in the following cost estimate prepared by the Congressional Budget Office. The committee estimates the cost to the government from enactment of this legislation to be $1 million in fiscal year 1979; $4 million in fiscal year 1980; $8 million in fiscal year 1981; $15 millin in fiscal year 1982; and $22 million in fiscal year 1983.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE,
Washington, D.C., April 26, 1978.

Hon. WILLIAM PROXMIRE,
Chairman, Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, Dirksen Senate Office Building, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to Section 403 of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the Congressional Budget Office has prepared the attached cost estimate for H.R. 2777, the National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act.

Should the Committee so desire, we would be pleased to provide further details on the attached cost estimate.

Sincerely,

ROBERT A. LEVINE,
Deputy Director.

APRIL 26, 1978.

CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET OFFICE—COST ESTIMATE

1. Bill number: H.R. 2777.

2. Bill title: National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act.

3. Bill status: As ordered reported by the Senate Committee on Banking Housing, and Urban Affairs, April 6, 1978.

4. Bill purpose: The bill would create the National Consumer Cooperative Bank, a mixed ownership government corporation. The bank would be authorized to make and guarantee loans and provide technical services to qualifying cooperative enterprises. Initial capitalization would be provided by up to $300 million in Treasury funds. Provisions are included in the bill for private ownership and control of the bank after the Treasury seed capital has been redeemed. Appropriations are also authorized to establish, within the bank, an Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance. This office could provide capital loans on a more favorable basis to qualifying borrowers than the bank itself, provide interest supplement loans to qualifying borrowers, and provide technical assistance to cooperatives.

5. Cost estimate: The table below presents the authorization levels as specified in the bill, the expected budget impact (outlays), and the estimated costs to the Government. For many government activities, costs and outlays are identical. However, for loan programs, costs differ substantially from outlays; they are therefore shown separately below:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Fiscal year 1979: | |
| Authorization levels [1] | $114 |
| Projected outlays | 23 |
| Estimated costs | 1 |
| Fiscal year 1980: | |
| Authorization levels [1] | 265 |
| Projected outlays | 51 |
| Estimated costs | 4 |
| Fiscal year 1981: | |
| Authorization levels [1] | 265 |
| Projected outlays | 85 |
| Estimated costs | 8 |
| Fiscal year 1982: | |
| Authorization levels [1] | 265 |
| Projected outlays | 122 |
| Estimated costs | 15 |
| Fiscal year 1983: | |
| Authorization levels [1] | 265 |
| Projected outlays | 246 |
| Estimated costs | 22 |

[1] Includes only those authorizations for which amounts are specified in the bill. In addition, the bill would allow the bank to issue debt in an amount not to exceed 5 times the bank's paid-in capital and surplus. The CBO estimates that the government's capital subscription will be sufficient to support the estimated activity levels of the bank through fiscal year 1982. To fund fiscal year 1983 activity, the CBO estimates the bank will need $182,000,000 in borrowings. It is uncertain, at this time, if the full amount of potential borrowing is scored as budget authority upon appropriation of the capitalization, or if the amount actually borrowed is scored when it is used.

The costs of this bill fall within budget function 370.

6. Basis of estimate: Title I. National Consumer Cooperative Bank.—Title I of the bill establishes the National Consumer Cooperative Bank and authorizes the appropriation of $100 million in fiscal year 1979 and an additional amount not to exceed $200 million in the aggregate for the next 4 fiscal years. The appropriated funds would be used by the Department of the Treasury to acquire class A stock in the bank, thus providing the bank's initial capitalization. The class A stock would be the senior form of equity in the bank, would return dividends to the Treasury at a rate specified in the bill, and eventually be fully retired. The activity funded by the title I authorizations is the bank's market rate loan program. These loans would be made on a business-like basis to qualifying cooperatives that demonstrate their ability to repay loans on a timely basis and at market rates of interest. During the period that class A stock is owned by the Treasury, the net outlays of the bank will be reflected as outlays in the Federal budget. The portion of outlays attributable to activities authorized in title I are a combination of loans (net of repayments), net operating expenses, interest income, dividends on stock, and additional capital received from other sources. The table below summarizes the various components of the outlay estimate through fiscal year 1983.

[In millions of dollars]

| | Fiscal year— | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 1979 | 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 |
| Disbursements: | | | | | |
| Additional loans | 20.0 | 50.0 | 85.0 | 125.0 | 265.0 |
| Operating expenses | 2.0 | 2.3 | 2.9 | 3.9 | 5.6 |
| Dividends and interest | 0 | 0 | .5 | 1.6 | 5.5 |
| Total disbursements | 22.0 | 52.3 | 88.4 | 130.5 | 276.1 |
| Income: | | | | | |
| Loan repayments | .7 | 2.9 | 7.4 | 14.8 | 28.5 |
| Interest | .8 | 3.3 | 8.0 | 15.6 | 29.5 |
| Fees | .2 | .5 | .8 | 1.2 | 2.6 |
| Sale of class B stock | .2 | .5 | .8 | 1.2 | 2.6 |
| Total income | 1.9 | 7.2 | 17.0 | 32.8 | 63.2 |
| Net outlays | 20.1 | 45.1 | 71.4 | 97.7 | 212.9 |

The projections of both loan levels and operating expenses are based on historical data for comparable agencies and on experts' projections for the Consumer Cooperative Bank. Loans here assumed to have an average maturity of 10 years, return interest at a rate of 8.25 percent, and have an average default rate of 6.5 percent. It was also assumed that borrowers would acquire class B stock at the minimum rate specified in the bill, 1 percent of the initial face amount of the loans. The assumed interest rate reflects the CBO projections for rates on equivalent long-term credit adjusted for the cost to the borrowers of the required purchases of class B stock. The default rate used is the net rate experienced by the Small Business Administration on its section 7(a) business loans. It is estimated that the bank will begin paying dividends to the Treasury in fiscal year 1981 but only at a rate of 25 percent of the net of interest income and operating expenses (including reserve for losses), since that amount was consistently lower than would be required at the average Treasury rate during the projection period.

The outlay estimate above expresses the budget impact of the bank's title I operations. However, the net cost to the Government is represented by the cost to the Treasury of borrowing the necessary funds, less any dividends paid to the Treasury by the bank. The interest rates used to estimate the Treasury's costs of borrowing are the CBO projections for the average cost of the Government's outstanding long-term debt. The costs to government are estimated as follows:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Fiscal year 1969: | |
| Cost of Treasury funds | $0.6 |
| Less dividends received | ----- |
| Net cost | 0.6 |
| Fiscal year 1980: | |
| Cost of Treasury funds | 2.6 |
| Less dividends received | ----- |
| Net cost | 2.6 |
| Fiscal year 1981: | |
| Cost of Treasury funds | 6.4 |
| Less dividends received | .5 |
| Net cost | 5.9 |
| Fiscal year 1982: | |
| Cost of Treasury funds | 12.4 |
| Less dividends received | 1.6 |
| Net cost | 10.8 |
| Fiscal year 1983: | |
| Cost of Treasury funds | 18.4 |
| Less dividends received | 3.1 |
| Net costs | 15.3 |

Title II. Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance.—Title II of the bill establishes, within the bank, an Office of Self-Help Development and Technical Assistance. The office would have the authority to make loans on more favorable terms to cooperatives unable to qualify under the provisions of title I of the bill. In addition, the office could make interest supplement loans to cooperatives that are temporarily unable to meet scheduled interest payments to the bank or any other lender. The office is also authorized to provide technical assistance and a variety of other services to cooperatives. The bill authorizes the appropriation of $10 million in fiscal year 1979 and an aggregate of $65 million in the next 2 years to be used only for the lending programs of the office. In addition, $2 million is authorized to be appropriated in fiscal year 1979 and such sums as may be needed the following 2 years to cover administrative costs and technical assistance costs of the office. Interest income and repayments from the loan programs can only be used for new loans. Fees charged for other services are to be used to offset expenses of the office. Outlays from the office established in title II of the bill are estimatd as follows:

| | Millions |
|---|---|
| Fiscal year 1979: | |
| Loans (net of interest income) | 2.0 |
| Administration and technical assistance (net of fees charged) | .5 |
| Total outlays | 2.5 |
| Fiscal year 1980: | |
| Loans (net of interest income) | 4.8 |
| Administration and technical assistance (net of fees charged) | .7 |
| Total | 5.5 |
| Fiscal year 1981: | |
| Loans (net of interest income) | 12.1 |
| Administration and technical assistance (net of fees charged) | 1.2 |
| Total | 13.3 |
| Fiscal year 1982: | |
| Loans (net of interest income) | 23.2 |
| Administration and technical assistance (net of fees charged) | 1.5 |
| Total | 24.7 |
| Fiscal year 1983: | |
| Loans (net of interest income) | 31.6 |
| Administration and technical assistance (net of fees charged) | 1.7 |
| Total | 33.3 |

Levels of lending activity in this cost estimate are based on industry projections of loan demand and comparable government agency experience. A 6 percent rate of interest and a default rate of 8 percent were assumed for these loans. Since most of the loans from the fund are expected to be principal-deferred loans, no repayments are expected before fiscal year 1982. Administrative costs are estimated based on experience of the Federal Home Loan Banks and Civil Service Commission data, and it is assumed that fees will cover 75 percent of such costs.

The actual cost to the Government, as distinct from the immediate budgetary impact, consists of the administrative costs (net of fees), the Treasury's net cost of borrowing the funds, and the amounts of defaulted loans. These are estimated as follows:

[In millions of dollars]

| | Fiscal year— | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | 1979 | 1980 | 1981 | 1982 | 1983 |
| Administrative and technical assistance costs (net of fees) | 0.5 | 0.6 | 1.2 | 1.5 | 1.7 |
| Treasury borrowing costs (net) | (1) | (1) | (1) | (1) | (1) |
| Loan defaults | .1 | .4 | 1.1 | 1.6 | 1.0 |
| Total costs | .6 | 1.1 | 2.3 | 4.1 | 6.8 |

[1] Less than $500,000.

7. Estimate comparison: None.

8. Previous CBO estimate: On May 11, 1977, the CBO prepared a cost estimate for H.R. 2777 as ordered reported by the House Committee on Banking, Finance, and Urban Affairs. The bill as ordered reported by the House Committee authorizes the same types of activities as the version considered in this cost estimate but with substantially higher funding authorizations.

On April 5, 1978, the CBO submitted a cost estimate for H.R. 2777, Committee Print No. 1, to the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs. The provisions affecting costs of the bill as ordered reported are the same as those in Committee Print No. 1. The cost estimates, therefore, are identical.

THE BREAKDOWN OF THE CBO'S KEYNESIAN MODEL; OR WHAT IS WRONG WITH THE COMMITTEE ON THE BUDGET'S ANALYSIS OF THE KEMP-ROTH TAX RATE REDUCTION ACT

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 20 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, two events happened this week which are of importance to the deliberations of this House. Although they happened in different forums, they are related to the shape of tax rate reductions.

The first was the House Committee on the Budget's release of a study purporting to show that the Kemp-Roth Tax Rate Reduction Act will produce inflationary deficits. There is little new in this study; it is mostly an elaboration of points previously made and answered. But there is no doubt about one thing: The study is a part of the campaign against tax rate reductions being orchestrated by the White House in response to their awareness in recent weeks that Kemp-Roth may have enough votes in the majority party to be passed by Congress. After all, the measure had 194 votes in March, and public support has grown significantly in the months that followed.

The second event was the publication in the Public Interest of an authoritative, well-reasoned, and convincingly articulated article by Dr. Paul Craig Roberts. Dr. Roberts, a professor of economics and a former member of the staff of the House Budget Committee, has rendered that committee's report and the analyses on which it relied virtually meaningless. How? By showing that the conclusions were drawn from erroneous premises, that the economic rationale behind the econometric studies on which the committee has relied is illogical, that neither people nor the economy behave or respond the way the Keynesians say they do.

Dr. Roberts' article goes to the points of the debate now before us: The relationship between tax rates and production and tax revenues, and the implications of that relationship upon conduct, incentives, rewards, spending, deficits, and inflation.

I will let Dr. Roberts speak for himself:

THE BREAKDOWN OF THE KEYNESIAN MODEL

(By Paul Craig Roberts)

There is much talk these days about "the crisis in Keynesian economics." That some such crisis exists is evident from the bewilderment and impotence our economic policy makers are displaying in their confrontation with economic reality. But what exactly is the nature of this crisis? What went wrong and what can put it right?

The answer, I would suggest, is almost embarrassingly simple. Today in the United States, public economic policy is formulated in bland disregard of the human incentives upon which the economy relies. Instead it is based on the Keynesian assumption that the gross national product (GNP) and employment are determined only by the level of aggregate demand or total spending in the economy. Unemployment and low rates of economic growth are seen as evidence of insufficient spending. The standard remedy is for government to increase total spending by incurring a deficit in its budget. GNP, it is believed, will then rise by some multiple of the increase in spending. Keynesian economics focuses on estimating the "spending gap" and the "multiplier" so that the necessary deficit can be calculated.

This view of economic policy is enshrined in the large-scale econometric forecasting models upon which both Congress and the Executive Branch rely for simulations of economic policy alternatives. It is a view that is extraordinary in its emphasis on spending. True, it is obvious that if people did not buy, no one would produce for market. It also seems obvious that the more people buy, the more will be produced and, therefore, that the use of government fiscal policy to increase total demand will increase total production or GNP. All this is so obvious to Keynesians that they believe any fiscal policy that produces an increase in government spending, even a spending increase matched by a tax increase, will produce an increase in GNP.

The concept of the "balanced-budget multiplier" illustrates the primacy that Keynesians give to spending as the determinant of production. According to this concept, government can increase total spending and, thereby, GNP by raising taxes and spending the revenues. The reasoning is as follows. People do not pay the higher taxes only by reducing their spending (consumption); they also reduce their savings. Therefore, when taxes are raised, the decrease in private spending is less than the increase in government spending. Conversely, a cut in tax rates, matched by a decrease in government spending, would result in a reduction in total spending (i.e., saving would increase), a fall in GNP, and a rise in unemployment.

For years after the 1964 Presidential election, college students were asked a standard question on economic exams: "What would happen if Barry Goldwater's prescription for a tax cut, matched by a spending cut, were implemented? They missed the answer if they did not reply that there would be a reduction in aggregate demand and, therefore, a fall in GNP and employment. Alas, for too many policy markers that is still the answer.

Since the "balanced-budget multiplier" implies that the greater the increase in taxes and in government spending, the greater the increase in GNP, it is a wonder no one ever asked what happens to production as tax rates rise. This question confronts economic policy with the incentive effects it has disregarded. It should be obvious even to Keynesians that when marginal tax rates are high, people will prefer additional leisure to additional current income, and additional current consumption to additional future income. As work effort and investment decline, production will fall, regardless of how great an increase there might be in aggregate demand. Such a recognition of disincentives implies a recognition of incentives, and Keynesians are gradually having to rethink the answer to their standard question about Barry Goldwater. Once one recognizes that people produce and invest for income, and that income depends on tax rates, one has reached the realization that fiscal policy causes changes not just in demand but also in supply.

THE ECONOMICS OF SUPPLY

The economics of spending has thoroughly neglected the economics of supply. On the supply side there are two important relative prices governing production. One price determines the choice between additional current income and leisure; the other determines the choice between additional future income (investment) and current consumption. Both prices are affected by the marginal tax rates. The higher the tax rates on earnings, the lower the cost of leisure and current consumption, in terms of foregone after-tax income.

As an illustration, consider the decision to produce. There are two uses of time—work and leisure. Each use has a price relative to the other. The price of additional leisure is the amount of income foregone by not working, and it is influenced by the tax rates. The higher the tax rates, the smaller the amount of after-tax income foregone by enjoying additional leisure. In other words, the higher the tax rates, the lower the relative price of leisure. When the marginal tax rate reaches 100 percent, the relative price of additional leisure becomes zero. At that point, additional leisure becomes a free good, because nothing has to be sacrificed in order to acquire it.

We often hear that a person works the first five months of the year for the government, and then starts working for himself. But that is not the way it goes. The first part of the year, he works for himself; he only begins working for the government when his income reaches taxable levels. The more he earns, the more he works for the government, until rising marginal rates discourage him from further work.

Take the case of a physician who encounters the 50-percent rate after six, eight, or 10 months of work. He is faced with working another six, four, or two months for only 50 percent of his earnings. Such a low after-tax return on their efforts encourages doctors to share practices, to reduce their working hours, and to take longer vacations. The high tax rates thus shrink the tax base by discouraging them from earning additional amounts of taxable income. They also drive up the cost of medical care by reducing the supply of medical services. A tax-rate reduction would raise the relative price of leisure and result in more taxable income earned and also in a greater supply of medical services.

The effect of tax rates on the decision to earn additional taxable income is not limited to physicians or to the top tax bracket; it operates across the spectrum of tax brackets. Studies by Martin Feldstein show that the tax rates on the average worker practically eliminate the gap between his after-tax-take-home pay and the level of untaxed unemployment compensation he could be receiving if he did not work. In this case, a marginal tax rate of 30 percent (including state and Federal income taxes and Social Security taxes) reduces the relative price of leisure so much that, by making unemployment competitive with work, it has raised the measured rate of unemployment by 1.25 percent and shrunk GNP and the tax base by the lost production of one million workers.

It is useful to give another example to illustrate that it is not just the top marginal rate that causes losses to GNP, employment, and tax revenues by discouraging people from earning additional taxable income. Blue-collar workers do not yet encounter the top marginal tax rate (although if inflation continues to push up money incomes, and the tax-rate structure remains unadjusted for inflation, it will not be many years before they do). Nevertheless, the marginal tax rates that many blue-collar workers already face are high enough to discourage them from earning additional taxable income. Take the case of a carpenter facing only a 25-percent marginal tax rate. For every additional $100 he earns before income tax, he gets to keep $75. Suppose that his house needs painting and that he can hire a painter for $80 a day and hire himself out for $100 a day. However, since his after-tax earnings are only $75, he saves $5 by painting his own house, so it pays him to choose not to earn the additional $100. In this case, the tax base shrinks by $180—of which $100 is the foregone earnings of the carpenter, and $80 is the lost earnings of the painter who is not hired. (Also, the productive efficiency associated with the division of labor vanishes.)

Suppose, instead, that the marginal tax rate on additional earnings by the carpenter were reduced to 15 percent. In this case, his after-tax earnings would be $85, and it would pay him to hire the painter. The reduction in the marginal tax rate would thus expand the tax base upon which revenues are collected by $180.

Studies by Gary Becker have made it clear that capital and labor are employed by households to produce utility through non-market activities (e.g., a carpenter painting his own house). Utility produced in this way is not purchased with income subject to taxation. Therefore, the amount of household-owned capital and labor supplied in the market will be influenced by marginal tax rates. The lower the after-tax income earned by supplying additional labor and capital in the market, the less the utility that the additional income can provide, and the more likely it is that households can increase their utility by allocating their productive resources to non-market activities. A clear implication of the new household economics is that the amount of labor and capital supplied in the market is influenced by the marginal tax rates.

Now consider how relative prices affect the choice concerning the use of income. There are two uses of income, consumption and saving (investment), and each has a price in terms of the other. The price of additional current consumption is the amount of future income foregone by enjoying additional current consumption. The higher the tax rates, the smaller the amount of after-tax future income foregone by enjoying additional current consumption. In other words, the higher the tax rates, the lower the relative price of current consumption.

Take the case of an Englishman facing the 98-percent marginal tax rate on investment income. He has the choice of saving $50,000 at a 17-percent rate of return, which would bring him $8,500 per year before taxes, or purchasing a Rolls Royce. Since the after-tax value of that $8,500 additional income is only $170 per year, the price of additional consumption is very low: He can enjoy having a fine motor car by giving up only $170 per year of additional income. This is why so many Rolls Royces are seen in England today. They are mistaken for signs of prosperity, whereas in fact they are signs of high tax rates on investment income.

A tax-rate reduction would raise the price of current consumption relative to future income, and thus result in more savings, making possible a growth in real investment. A rate reduction not only increases disposable income and total spending, it also changes the composition of total spending toward more investment. Thus, labor productivity, employment, and real GNP are raised above the levels that would result from the same amount of total spending more heavily weighted toward current consumption.

TAX CUTS AND REBATES

The econometric models upon which the government relies for simulations of policy alternatives do not take into account these supply-side effects on GNP of these relative price changes. Consider the alternatives faced by the Keynesian policy maker who wants "to get the economy moving again." His goal is to increase aggregate demand or total spending. How can he do this? He has the choice between the balanced-budget multiplier (i.e., increasing both taxes and government spending) or a deficit. He will discard the balanced-budget multiplier, because it is relatively weak and deficits are more politically acceptable than legislating higher tax rates. Having settled on a deficit, he has to choose how to produce it. He can hold tax revenues constant and increase government spending, or he can hold government spending constant and cut tax revenues. In the latter case, he has a choice between rebates and permanent reductions in tax rates. Wanting the most stimulus for his deficit dollar, he will ask for econometric simulations of his three policy alternatives: a tax rebate, a tax rate reduction, or an increase in government spending programs.

The simulations, all based on Keynesian assumptions, will show that a revenue reduction of a given amount, whether in the form of a rebate of personal income taxes or a reduction in personal-income-tax rates, will raise disposable income—and thereby spending and GNP—by the same amount. The policy maker may prefer the rebate for reasons of "flexibility." The spending stimulus may not be required in the following year, and, if it is, he has the option of providing it either by another rebate or by an increase in government spending programs. But on the basis of the econometric simulation, he will be indifferent as to the choice between rebates or rate reductions. As for his third option, an increase in government spending programs, the simulation may report that, dollar for dollar, an increase in government purchases (as contrasted with transfers) will have a more powerful impact on GNP because the government spends all of the money, whereas if it is returned to consumers they will save part of it. Based on the econometric simulation of his alternatives, he will conclude that there is no compelling economic reason in favor of any of the three, and he will make his choice on a political basis.

But the econometric models have misled the policy maker. Unlike a reduction in personal-income-tax rates, a rebate affects no individual choice at the margin. It does not change the relative prices governing the choices between additional current income and leisure or between additional future income and current consumption. It does not raise the relative prices of leisure and current consumption. Therefore, a rebate directly stimulates neither work nor investment. For any given revenue reduction, a rebate cannot cause as great an increase in GNP as a rate reduction, because it does not affect the choices that would cause people to allocate more time and more income to increasing production for the market.

An increase in government spending fares no better by comparison, and may fare even worse. It too fails to raise the after-tax rewards for work and investment. Furthermore, it increases the percentage of total resources used in the government sector. If the government sector uses resources less efficiently than the private sector, as seems to be the case, the result is a decline in the efficiency with which resources are used—which means GNP would be less than it otherwise would be. Yet the econometric simulations of the policy maker's alternatives will pick up none of the incentive and disincentive effects of these relative price changes. Instead, they focus on the effects of these alternatives on disposable income and on spending.

There are a number of adverse consequences of this extraordinary preoccupation with spending. One is that the models exaggerate the net tax-revenue losses that result from cutting tax rates. The only "feedback effect" on the tax base and tax revenues that they provide for is the expansion of GNP in response to an increase in demand. They do not provide for the expansion in GNP that results from higher after-tax rewards for work and investment. The supply-side "feedback effects" are ignored. Similarly, revenue gains from tax-rate increases will be overestimated, because the disincentive effects are left out.

A second consequence follows from the popular misidentification of a tax rebate as a tax cut, and from a similar tendency on the part of most policy makers to see rebates and rate cuts as variations of the same policy instrument. If Milton Friedman is correct that personal consumption is a function of permanent income, a temporary rebate has little impact even on spending. Thus, on the basis of experience with rebates, tax cuts per se might come to be seen as relatively ineffectual, leaving the field open to proponents of government spending programs.

A third consequence is that the true effects of large tax increases (such as the proposed energy taxes, or the $227-billion increase in the Social Security tax over the next decade) will not be accurately calculated. Policy makers see these tax increases as withdrawals from disposable income and spending, and their only concern is "to put money back" into spending so that aggregate demand does not fall. However, these tax increases change the relative prices and incentives of leisure and work, consumption and investment. They produce resource reallocations that have adverse implications for employment and the rate of economic growth. Yet the econometric models, as now constructed, flash no warning lights.

Consider what Arthur Laffer, in the Wall Street Journal, has called the "tax wedge." The Social Security tax increase provides a good example of this phenomenon. It is a tax on employment, and, as economists should know, a tax on employment will reduce employment. The employer's decision to hire is based on the gross cost to him of an employee. The employee's decision to work is based on his after-tax pay. We know that the higher the price, the less the quantity demanded, and the lower the price, the less the quantity supplied. The Social Security tax both raises the price to the demander and lowers it to the supplier. By increasing the Social Security tax, policy makers reduced both job opportunities and the inclination to work.[1] They raised the cost of labor relative to capital for the employer, and they narrowed the gap between unemployment compensation and after-tax takehome pay for a wider range of workers. Since the revenues available for paying Social Security benefits depend on both the tax rates and the number of people paying into the system, the increase in rates will be offset to some degree by a decrease in the number of people paying into the system. It is hard to see how the Social Security system can be saved by decreasing employment, or how increasing the demand for unemployment compensation is likely to free general revenues for Social Security benefits.

"CROWDING OUT" INVESTMENT

There are at least two other important points on which economic policy is misinformed by the neglect of incentives and of choices made at the margin. One is the impact on GNP of reductions in the corporate-income-tax rate, and the other is the controversy over whether government fiscal policy "crowds out" private investment.

Simulations run by the Congressional Budget Office and the House Budget Committee on two of the three large-scale commercial econometric models show declines in GNP as a result of reductions in corporate-tax rates. In one of the models, corporate investment did not depend on after-tax profits in a very strong way, but was very sensitive to changes in interest rates. Since interest rates rise as the Treasury increases its borrowing to finance the deficit resulting from the tax cut, investment falls, and the model predicted a decline in GNP as the result of a tax-rate reduction that increased the profitability of investment.[2]

The other model predicted that a corporate-tax-rate reduction would slightly raise real GNP after a lag of a couple of quarters, but it predicted a lower nominal GNP for two years. Nominal GNP declined because the corporate-tax-rate reduction reduced the user cost of capital, the price mark-up, and thereby the inflation rate, thus lowering the nominal price level.

To the extent that Keynesians think about the "crowding out" of private investment by fiscal policy, it is in terms of upward pressure on interest rates as a result of government borrowing to finance budget deficits. They do not realize that investment is crowded out by taxation, regardless of whether the budget is in balance. To understand how, consider the following example. Suppose that a 10-percent rate of return must be earned if an investment is to be undertaken. In the event that government imposes a 50-percent tax rate on investment income, investments earning 10 percent will no longer be undertaken. Only investments earning 20 percent before tax will return 10 percent after tax. Taxation crowds out investment by reducing the number of profitable investments. When tax rates are reduced, after-tax rates of return rise, and the number of profitable investments increases.

So "crowding out" cannot be correctly analyzed merely in terms of events in the financial markets: "Crowding out" occurs in terms of real output. It is the preempting of production capacity by government outlays, regardless of whether these outlays are financed by taxing, borrowing, or money creation.

RESPONDING TO INCENTIVES

A concern with the supply-side effects of fiscal policy is incompatible with the concept of economic policy that currently reigns in the Congress and in the Executive Branch. Members of the House Budget Committee asked Alice Rivlin, Director of the Congressional Budget Office, and Bert Lance, then Director of the Office of Management and Budget, about the neglect of the incentive effects of tax-rate changes on supply and also about the econometric predictions that GNP would fall in response to a reduction in corporate tax rates.

Dr. Rivlin said that she and her staff had been "particularly troubled" by model findings that GNP declines if corporate tax rates are reduced. However, she went on to say:

"Studies have generally found that tax-rate changes are less important than changes in the cost of capital and changes in levels of national output in influencing the level of investment. It follows that an investment tax credit or liberalized depreciation will increase investment more than a corporate-tax-rate reduction of equivalent revenue loss. While we do not believe that corporate-tax-rate cuts reduce investment, it would not be surprising to find that tax cuts had only a minor expansionary effect."

The OMB staff reply to this question was ambiguous.

Both CBO and OMB realized that the question about incentive effects most fundamentally challenged their concept of economic policy. The comments of Rivlin, Lance, and the OMB staff all unequivocally acknowledged that the econometric models upon which they rely for guidance in the choice of economic policy alternatives do not include any relative price effects of changes in personal-income-tax rates. However, since they believe that the performance of the economy is a function of spending levels, not of production incentives, they expressed no concern over this neglect. They said that economic theory and empirical studies leave it unclear whether the neglected supply-side effects are important; regardless of how the issue is resolved, they questioned the practical importance of supply incentives for short-run policy analysis.

There are two parts to this argument. One is that it is unclear whether lowering personal-income-tax rates will increase or reduce work effort. The other is that it is unclear whether any incentive effects on work effort and investment would show up as quantitatively important in a short-run policy framework. The first proposition questions the existence of the incentive effects; the second question is whether they would be effective in time to deal with an immediate problem of economic stabilization.

It is easy to dispose of the latter point. The long-run consists of a series of short-runs. If policies that are effective over a longer period are neglected because they do not have an immediate impact, and if policies that are damaging over the longer period are adopted because they initially have beneficial results, then policy makers will inevitably come to experience, sometime in the future, a period when they will have no solution for the crisis they have provoked. In the United States, that future might be now.
